Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to ask the Senator whether it would be possible under any system that would square with the Constitution to avoid the inequalities or matters of disproportion to which the Senator has been referring in his discussion; in other words, is it not absolutely necessary, in order that such a provision have any constitutional basis whatever, that it rest upon the mileage of the roads in the States which come under the designation of post roads? If in a small area like Massachusetts or Rhode Island they have, owing to the density of population, a very large mileage of post roads, while in a State of vast geographical extent they may have a comparatively small mileage of post roads, nevertheless the expenditure of Federal funds must, in the nature of things, rest upon the fact that the road is a post road, and, consequently, the inequalities, concerning which the Senator is addressing himself, are inevitable if we embark upon the enterprise at all.

Mr. BRYAN. If the Senator will allow that question to remain in abeyance, I shall reach it before I conclude.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well.

Mr. BRYAN. I was explaining this table and had finished doing so.

Mr. President, I think it is hardly fair to the committee to say that the report which it has made and the amendment which it has submitted indicate that the committee is opposed to Federal aid to good roads. As I am speaking somewhat for the committee, I may say that the committee itself, as a whole, favor Federal aid to good roads. I am of the opinion that money has to be collected somewhere before it can be spent; and that whether the Government spends it or the State spends it or the county spends it, it has to be taken out of the taxes of the people; but the committee recognizes the fact that there is a demand for Federal aid to good roads.

The proposition we had before us was as to which method should be favored by the committee. Starting out with this proposition, which means an expenditure of millions upon millions of the people's money, it occurred to the committee that to have a subcommittee of the Senate and of the other House take 90 days to investigate this plan and other plans—some plans submitted here to-day—would not be a matter that could be justly criticized by anybody.

So far as I am concerned, I do not believe that the farmers are demanding hasty and ill-advised legislation. I was much amused by the remark of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that some here in this body would vote and had voted to donate to the railroad companies millions of acres of public lands to enable them to build railroads and now would not vote any money to enable the farmers to have good dirt roads or hard roads. Senators, the oldest Member here is older than I think he is if any of the present membership of this body was sitting in the Senate from 1850 to 1860 when those acts of Congress were passed.

Mr. President, the farmers have never yet asked any special favor at the hands of this Government, and that we will do justice by them is all they want and all they ever will ask.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from Florida takes his seat——

Mr. BRYAN. I had not said anything about taking my seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was very much interested in the tables which he had. The State of Iowa, the State of Mississippi, and the State of Indiana are pretty nearly the same area. If the Senator does not object, I should like to have him read the figures for those three State—Iowa, Indiana, and Mississippi—so that they may appear in his speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in juxtaposition one with another.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I will be very glad to do that.

Mr. Page, Chief of the Office of Good Roads, outlines this position. While upon investigation it might be determined that it ought not to be adopted, yet it is worthy of consideration. Before I come to that, I will comply with the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Indiana has 51,175 rural-route roads; 24,955 miles of improved roads. The percentage of all roads improved in 1909, 36.70; population, 2,700,876.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What amount would Indiana get under this plan?

Mr. BRYAN. Indiana would get three-quarters of a million.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Three-quarters of a million.

Mr. BRYAN. Iowa has 60,020 miles of rural routes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now?

Mr. BRYAN. And would get $900,000; percentage of improved roads, 2.45, as against 36.70 in Indiana, and she has a population of 2,224,711. Mississippi has 18,570 miles; percentage of improved roads, eighty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent; population, 1,797,114.

Mr. WILLIAMS. She would get how much?

Mr. BRYAN. Mississippi would get about $300,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mississippi would get $300,000, Iowa $900,000, Indiana three-quarters of a million, or $750,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I know the Senator from Florida does not wish to leave a wrong impression upon the Senate. His figures are correct to this extent: That is limited to the rural routes, but this provides also for star routes. In sections of the country where there are a great many rural routes there are very few star routes. Of course, putting in rural routes takes off certain star routes. Star routes deliver now to some extent like rural cars, by depositing the mail in the road box. This bill provides for paying for star routes.

The average star route in the United States is 13 miles, and there are about 160,000 miles of star routes. They would be paid by this bill. The right way to make the estimates is to add the star-route mileage to the rural delivery routes.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me explain that right now. The reason the star-route mileage was not placed in the rural-route mileage is that so many of the star routes are over water.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator will wait a moment. There are so many of them over water that it is hardly to be supposed that under any classification at all they could come within the provisions of roads entitled to receive under class C.

I want to ask the Senator from Virginia if in his remarks he has incorporated this table?

Mr. SWANSON. I have.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I will not incorporate it in mine.

Mr. SWANSON. Does not——

Mr. BRYAN. Let me say this: It would make very little difference so far as the three States to which reference has been made are concerned. I will put that in right now.

Indiana has 99 miles of star route; Iowa, 55; Mississippi, 309.

Mr. SWANSON. You will see how it is equalized, as I have suggested. The average length of a star route in the United States is 13 miles, and I presume the average in Mississippi would be the same as elsewhere. If you will multiply 300 star routes by 13 it would give the number of miles in Mississippi which would be paid for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the star routes in Mississippi are mainly on the Mississippi and other rivers.

Mr. REED, Mr. SWANSON, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will be in order. Does the Senator from Florida yield, and to whom?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator from Florida in figuring the distribution of this money has taken the number of miles of star routes and rural routes.

Mr. SWANSON. No. Rural routes.

Mr. REED. Rural routes; and he computed upon that basis the amount coming to each State. Is that correct?

Mr. BRYAN. That is correct.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, he might as well have figured on the problem based upon the railroad mileage of a State. This bill does not propose at any place to pay a certain amount per mile upon the rural routes, and that is what the Senator figured on. This bill proposes to pay upon the number of miles of road that are improved and brought up to the specifications of the bill. Accordingly, a State might have 10,000 miles of road and 5,000 miles of rural routes and not get one dollar under this bill, and another State might have 500 miles of road and might collect on every mile of it, if it was improved to the proper standard and that entire mileage used as a rural route. So that the figures so painfully prepared by the Senator have not anything to do with the case at all.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, that is always the last refuge of a man who can not answer an argument.

Mr. REED. I have not answered it. I have demolished it. There is not anything left of it.

Mr. BRYAN. I know the Senator has, in his opinion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator from Florida that if he will permit one more interruption I will try to let him alone.

The Senator from Missouri thinks he has demolished; he is absolutely confident of the fact that he has murdered Macbeth; but the truth is that under this bill a State may receive fifteen or twenty or twenty-five dollars a mile for each mile of road that it brings up to a certain stage, and the possibilities of its receipts are limited by the number of rural routes in the State. So that Iowa could receive $900,000 Indiana could receive $750,000, and Mississippi could receive only $300,000, if all three improved up to the Agricultural Department specifications every mile of road they had that was a rural free-delivery route.

Moreover, one more word. I have had experience enough here in Washington to know that the States which are doubtful politically receive rural free-delivery extensions and accommodations much more than the States which are not doubtful.

Mr. BRYAN. It is a fact disclosed by the table of figures I produced that with States having practically the same area, practically the same population, some have a very small number of rural delivery routes and some relatively a very large number. I use that simply as one argument to show that it is a difficult proposition to undertake to divide fairly and equitably this appropriation between the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand your table, it does not undertake to show what each State actually would receive, but the possibilities of receipt in each case.

Mr. BRYAN. I am of the opinion that if the Department of Agriculture could, by employing a sufficient number of inspectors, hold each community rigidly up to the requirements of this bill, make every road be maintained throughout the year with smooth, compact surface, the only States that would be benefited would be those having roads of a high grade. But no man can read the report and the debates upon this question and come to any other conclusion than that it is the intention to give these rural routes the benefit of this bill under classification C.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRYAN. Just one word further on that; and if this bill does not do it, it is inevitable that as this system grows the demand will be so great that every rural route, regardless of whether it comes up to any specification or not, will receive the benefits of this act. That is bound to come; and if so, I would vote for it, because I can not see a difference between a road which shows wheel tracks and one which does not; and if the Government should pay rent for the use of the road, there are sand roads which show wheel tracks just as good as and better than clay roads that would not do it in dry weather.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. It is a little tardy now to say what I wanted to say.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator will realize I can yield to only one Senator at a time.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. I am not complaining. I am thanking the Senator for his courtesy.

The defect which I sought in my humble way, and in my ignorant way to point out in the argument of the Senator from Florida, was that he had based his calculations not upon the number of miles of road that would be improved or that were now improved, so that they would come within the provisions of this bill, but he had based his conclusions upon the number of miles of road that now happen to be used for rural routes. I thought I had made that plain until the Senator from Mississippi took the floor and accused me of having convinced myself and nobody else.

Now, I do not expect to convince the Senator from Mississippi. I have never known him to be convinced after he had once taken a position; but as he is generally right, and as I generally agree with him, I am always content that he should maintain his opinion. I am now. But I call attention to the fact that what the Senator from Florida was doing was to give us a mathematical deduction based upon certain figures, and that now both the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Mississippi have abandoned mathematics and have gone into the realms of possibilities, and they are talking now about what it might be possible for the State to get, and not answering the point I sought to make that these figures were misleading because they depended upon a wrong basis.

While I have the floor, with the courtesy of the Senator from Florida, a word further on that point. The rural routes in any State may be extended or contracted at any time. The rural-route system has not yet by any means been fully established or completed. There may be States that have been unfairly treated; but I take it that those inequalities will be removed speedily, particularly after the 4th of next March. But how futile it is to stand and argue that because one State to-day has more rural mileage than another that that is a reason why we should not improve any of the roads. I am directing my attention now simply to that one argument, and I shall take pleasure, when I resume my remarks, to spend some little time on it.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course it is my fault, but there is nothing in what I intended to say that would deceive anybody about that table. I said frankly that if the roads under class C are rigidly inspected they would not come within this provision, and I invite the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the debates and the report where it is estimated that it will cost $18,000,000.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Virginia, who argued strenuously for the House provision, should have a conference, because the Senator from Virginia argued that the postponement for a year would give all of the States an opportunity to come within the provisions of the act and have their roads up to the standard of class C by the time the act goes into effect in 1914.

Now, Mr. President, when I was interrupted, I was about to outline the plan recommended by the Chief of the Office of Good Roads. Two or three Senators here to-day have advocated the plan of the Government building the roads. The plans recommended by this officer of the Agricultural Department is that a board of engineers in consultation with the State authorities shall lay out a system of roads in this country, estimated at 33,000 miles.

It is estimated that 33,000 miles of road would be reasonably sufficient, and if the State would build roads as outlined up to a certain standard the Government would then undertake to keep them up to that standard. I was surprised to hear him say that a road costing $10,000 a mile required an expenditure of $1,000 per annum to keep it in condition. It seemed like a large sum, but he stated that upon an investigation of the accounts of the State of New York on roads costing $10,000 a mile the average was $1,000 per annum. So I was not surprised to-day to hear the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] make the statement that it took about a thousand dollars per mile to keep up the splendid roads in his State. I am not undertaking to oppose Federal aid to good roads, but believing that this provision in the House bill is not the last and final word of wisdom on this subject, it appeared better to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to propose instead the following amendment:

That a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of three members of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and three members of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to be designated by the respective chairmen thereof, to make an inquiry into the subject of Federal aid in the construction of highways, and report at the earliest practicable date, and said committee shall have power to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary and conduct hearings, and for the payment of the expenses of such inquiry there is hereby appropriated the sum of $5,000, to be paid upon vouchers signed by the chairman of said committee.

I think it is well for Senators to understand that this committee of three members of the committee of each House are instructed to report at the earliest practicable date, and that if we are going into this tremendous business we will have some information and be in a position to do a larger degree of justice at least to the States affected, and at least it can be said that if any sensible plan is adopted it will go into the roads and not into the hands of township or county roads supervisors in a way that does not require the spending of a single dollar upon the roads.

I was not surprised by the statement of that man that the only way roads are maintained after they are built is to have a central authority, as a State engineer. County commissioners do not keep up the roads when they build them. They build a road to one community to satisfy it and to another community to satisfy it, and in the endeavor to satisfy various communities the roads theretofore built have gone to pieces and the money is thrown away.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator from Florida allow me?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to correct the Senator in that statement. My own State of New Jersey is noted for its superb roads. We are fairly gridironed with them. We are a small State, it is true, but we have something like 800 miles of roads there, and they have been built by the county system. Our roads run from the line of one county to the county line of another, and are taken up by the supervisors or freeholders under the supervision of a county engineer. The roads do not blow away, but they are put there to stay by our county commissioners. We have a State-aid law and the State contributes a certain proportion to the building of our roads.

I want to disabuse the Senator's mind of the thought that because they are built by the various counties they are necessarily poorly and miserably built.

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the Senator from New Jersey understands that I was stating the argument of the Chief of the Office of Good Roads before the committee.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought it was the Senator's own argument.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course we all know that New Jersey is an exception to the rule.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. We have a model road man, I am frank to say, and a model in many other ways; and I am happy in the thought that that will be recorded as the great consensus of public opinion in a few months. But, as to the road system, I do believe that our system is about the perfection of road making.

Mr. BRYAN. I am very glad to have the statement of the Senator from New Jersey incorporated in my remarks.

Now, I have detained the Senate much longer than I expected.

Mr. SWANSON. Before the Senator concludes, I should like to show this great disparity he has made between Mississippi and Iowa, and to give a striking case of gross and glaring injustice. I want to explain how this works out, and I want to show what the most glaring disparity amounts to.

In Mississippi there are 18,570 miles of rural routes. Suppose that all of them were put under class C, and all were in class C at $15 per mile, Mississippi would receive $278,550.

In Mississippi there are 779 star routes, and where there are a great many rural-delivery routes there are more star routes. The star-route average in the United States is 13 miles. So there would be in Mississippi 10,127 miles of star routes which would receive $151,905. The aggregate amount received by Mississippi would be $430,455.

Mississippi has a population of 1,790,000 in round numbers, and Mississippi would receive 24 cents per capita for every citizen in the State.

Iowa has a great many rural delivery routes and very few star routes. In Iowa there are 60,020 miles of rural delivery routes, which, figured at $15 per route, would amount to $630,100. Now, having a great many rural-delivery routes, the whole State of Iowa has 55 star routes which, at 13 miles each, would amount to 915 miles, and at $15 a mile it would amount to $9,225 per star route, making the aggregate in Iowa, if these figures are true, $639,325.

Iowa has a population of 2,240,000. Divide the amount received by the population of the State and every man, woman, and child in Iowa would get 28 cents, or 4 cents per capita more than Mississippi.

Iowa has 55,000 square miles and Mississippi has 46,000 square miles.

That is a most glaring exhibition of disparity.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I wish to put a question to the Senator from Virginia. In the distribution of the estimated amount that would have to be appropriated by the Government for the purpose of building good roads in the several States, I should like to know, under this calculation of the Senator from Virginia, how much of the $20,000,000 would go to the State of New York. I can tell about how much the State of New York would contribute.

Mr. SWANSON. How much does the Senator think it would contribute?

Mr. O'GORMAN. About a sixth or a seventh of the entire amount.

Mr. SWANSON. That would be about $3,000,000. Now, if the Senator from Florida will permit me further, there are 79,279 miles, and you would get about a million and a half, I assume. This is one of the advantages——

Mr. BRYAN. I do not yield for an argument, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. The only way you can build up——

Mr. BRYAN. I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida declines to yield further, and he will proceed.

Mr. BRYAN. All I have to say in reply is that it is difficult to argue with a man who in multiplying $60,000 by 15 makes only $600,000 instead of $900,000.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I prefer to take the figures of the Senator from Florida to the figures of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask permission to insert at the end of my remarks a table showing number of rural routes, rural-route mileage, road mileage, and so forth, in the United States, by States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Number of rural routes, rural route mileage, road mileage, etc., in the United States.

State.	Number of rural routes, 1912.	Rural route mileage, 1912.	Road mileage, 1909.	Mileage of improved roads, 1909.	Percentage of all roads improved, 1909.	Area in square miles.	Population, 1910.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was a little late when the Senate reconvened and hence did not have the opportunity to continue my remarks in order, and now that I have heard a good deal of this debate I am rather glad I was late, because the debate makes manifest the necessity of doing just what I was attempting to do when the Senate took its recess, namely, the analysis of the bill so that we may clearly understand just what the bill actually does propose to do. I had, when the hour of adjournment arrived, reached the point of demonstrating, at least to my own satisfaction—I do not include my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]—the fact that the road overseer is not the man who determines when the money shall be paid or whether the road has been kept up to the standard, but that these facts are determined by a Federal authority. The language of the bill is so plain there can be no dispute.

I come now to the question that was under discussion as I entered the Chamber, namely, whether these roads must be kept up to the standard during the entire year or only a portion of the year, and whether if kept to the standard only a part of the year the payment would be prorated and paid for the period of the year during which the road was maintained.

Mr. President, if I understand this bill, there is no question of prorating in it. In order to receive any pay under the bill the road must be brought to a certain standard and kept at that standard continuously throughout the year. I think that is plain from the reading of the bill itself.

Class A is defined, and I quote from the bill—

Class A shall embrace roads of not less than 1 mile in length—

And so forth—

Here follows a description of the materials—

crowned, compacted, and maintained in such manner that it shall have continuously a firm, smooth surface.

Class B shall embrace roads—

And so forth—

Describing the materials—constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In a moment; when I get to the end of my sentence.

Class C shall embrace roads—

And so forth—

crowned so as to shed water quickly into the side ditches, continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means——

Mr. OVERMAN. Right there I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. REED (reading)—

so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

Mr. OVERMAN. Right there I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will wait until I get through with this sentence, I will yield then.

Now, that does not mean for one day in a week or one week in a month or one month in year. It means just what it says—"continuously."

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator.

Mr. REED. Yes. Will the Senator wait until I conclude the paragraph, and then I will yield to him—

That whenever the United States shall use any highway of any State, or civil subdivision thereof, which falls within classes A, B, or C, for the purpose of transporting rural or star-route mail, compensation for such use shall be made at the rate of $15, $20, or $25 per annum per mile for highways.

Now, that language, all taken together, means that the Government shall pay $15, $20, or $25 per mile for such mileage as shall have been continuously maintained, not intermittently maintained, not occasionally maintained, not sometimes maintained, but continuously maintained at the particular standard specified.

Now I yield to either of the Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wanted to know really the Senator's construction of that section, because he seems to differ with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. REED. I do, most emphatically.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator from Virginia as to our red hills in Virginia and North Carolina, when a part of the time we have bad roads and a part of the time good roads, whether we get the money in the State for half the time. As I understand the Senator from Missouri, these roads have to be kept continuously in good repair before we get any money at all during the whole year.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. So when they are muddy and impassable in the wintertime those roads would get nothing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we want to discuss this bill with an effort to get at just what it means. It is an important matter. We may in the good nature of debate, and in an effort to try to get a little temporary advantage, sometimes reach a little over the line, but in the end we must come to the merits of the bill. This bill was not prepared altogether by amateurs. Some pretty sensible men sat down in the House for a long time over it, and the more you study it I think the more you will find the House committee met every question.

Now, let me show the Senator from North Carolina, if I can, how they met this very question with reference to the dirt roads of his State. The language of the bill, in defining class A, which is a road constructed of shells, vitrified brick, or macadam, is that it shall be continuously a firm, smooth, rounded surface.

When you come to class B, which is also a hard-surface road, composed of burnt clay, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, sand and gravel, or rock and gravel, the bill requires that it shall be constructed and maintained in such manner as to have continuously a firm, smooth surface.

Those two kinds of roads must have continuously a firm, smooth surface throughout the year, because they are hard roads and can be maintained throughout the year hard and smooth and firm. Now come to the third class, which is dirt road, and observe the language there. It shall be—continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means—

Not so that it shall be hard and kept continuously hard, but this is the language:

So that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

So that it is only required that a dirt road at every season of the year shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles, but it is not required that a dirt road shall at all seasons of the year be perfectly smooth and perfectly hard. Thus the House committee provided a sensible rule for the dirt roads, viz, they must be at all times reasonably passable. I believe the provision meets thoroughly the question asked by the Senator from North Carolina. Nothing impracticable is required.

The House committee, I think, are quite as wise as any United States road overseer, by whatsoever name he is technically known, who says it takes a thousand dollars to keep each mile of rock road in repair each year, because, speaking of the country at large, I know that a man who makes that kind of a statement does not know anything about road building or road maintenance. We have 300 miles of rock road in my county, nearly half as much as there is in the entire State of New Jersey, according to the statement of the Senator from that State. We have been building those roads for 15 years, and our experience has been that approximately $250 a mile annually will keep them in excellent condition, although they lie in a county contiguous to a large city where the traffic is two or three or four times what it is in the more sparsely settled portions of the State. Any statement of any man that it takes on the average the country over a thousand dollars a mile annually to maintain a gravel or rock road is the mere vaporing of one who does not know his business as well as an ordinary country road overseer, who has been so mercilessly denounced by the opponents of the House provision.

Now, Mr. President, we get down, then, to this: Where there is a rock road it must be kept smooth and hard throughout the year; where there is a gravel or shell road it must be kept smooth and hard throughout the year. That kind of road can be traveled in all sorts of weather. A good road of that kind is actually better immediately after a dashing rain than it is after a long dry spell. There is no difficulty in traveling it. When you come to the dirt road the requirement is that it shall be kept reasonably passable and that it shall be constructed in a certain manner. The results of actual experience on that kind of road in my State—of course, soil differs, climate differs, conditions differ; and I can not speak for the entire country—but in my State a road that is ditched, properly constructed, and regularly dragged as it ought to be will be reasonably passable throughout substantially the entire year. So that the men who framed this bill did it with some wisdom and with some foresight and did take into consideration varying conditions and the different kinds of roads.

I come now to the next objection urged, which is that it will cost much money to determine whether a road is up to the standard or not. In reply, I say that if the certificate of the local road overseer should be falsely made, if the certificate of the county court or board of supervisors should be falsely made, if the certificate of all the local authorities should be false, you have yet left the certificate of the rural delivery carrier who passes over the road two or three times every day. It has been said the rural deliverer is a local man, and that he will be controlled by local influences, and therefore he will not tell the truth about the road he must travel over every day of his life; and so Senators sit here in much the frame of mind that the old prophet was when he said in his heart, "All men are liars," and they add, "All men are cowards"; but is their argument true with reference to the rural route carrier? As a matter of fact, he generally lives somewhere near his route, often in a small country village or a little country city. He has to travel his route each day. He drives his own horse. If the roads are not maintained, he can not deliver his mail or is obliged to overwork his horse and overtax himself. Under such conditions the rural carrier will be the first man to file a complaint against that road and try to have it brought up to the proper standard. But over and above all that is the fact that at very small expense the United States Government, through its post-office inspectors and its army of employees, can easily determine whether the roads are kept to the standard.

But the objections I have just discussed apply with the same force and to the same effect to every plan for road improvement that can be devised in the brain of any man in the Senate. All plans for road improvement involve some plan of inspection.

I come now to another argument, that there will be an unequal distribution of these funds among the respective States. That is a very seductive argument to offer to the man who comes from a small State. This provision is a part of a post-office measure, and if we were to get down to the kind of argument I am replying to we could apply it to the entire Post Office bill and to the entire Post Office system. So, we might find it argued here that we ought to abolish the Post Office system, because under it Delaware does not get as much benefit, does not have as much mail delivered to it, and does not have as much money spent within its borders as is expended in the Empire State of New York or in the great principality of Texas. Why, sirs, that argument is a boy's argument, because if you use it at all you must apply it all along the line; and when you do, you strike at every appropriation the Government makes for internal improvements, because if you apply it in one case you should in all.

Moreover, it is a narrow argument—an argument so narrow that I hesitate to take the time of the Senate to answer it. A man in the city of New York mails a letter which is to be delivered in a remote portion of Mississippi or of Texas. That man pays 2 cents to send his letter. He is interested in the rapidity and certainty of its transmission. He therefore receives a benefit from every good road that is built, infinitesimal of course, but out of these infinitesimals are made the great aggregate of benefits conferred by the Postal Service. On the other hand, the man in the remote districts of a State or Territory is interested in having his mail speedily delivered to the city or delivered to another State, and he, in turn, acquires his fair share of the advantages that flow from good roads. Thus to the people of the United States in the aggregate accrue the aggregate benefits of this bill, each citizen getting his share as nearly as such benefits can be distributed. Mr. President, is it any argument against improving the roads of this country to say, "Well, Delaware would not get as much as Texas"? That argument would stop every kind of improvement. It would halt governmental projects at each State line in order that it might apportion its expenditures not according to necessities or benefits but according to population.

The Government of the United States does not maintain a Post Office Department, sir, for the benefit of the States. The Government of the United States when it establishes a post office knows no State line; it does not enter the States as States, but it starts upon its business and it pursues its business as an agency not of the States but of the sovereign citizenship of the United States of America, and it comes in no other capacity. When it does so, it trenches not upon the rights of a State, for it is within the constitutional powers which were conferred upon it when the people founded the Government.

Mr. President, so much for these narrow arguments. Before I conclude my remarks, I feel that I ought to reply briefly to the argument of my good friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Generally he is not only of the people and for the people, but he is, in fact, the voice of the people calling, like "the noise of many waters," for their rights. Yet when he stood here this evening opposing this provision he told us that the Government had "already been very generous to the people in establishing rural routes"; that "it is preposterous to ask the Federal Government to do more for the people." Thus he pictured the Federal Government as an entity outside of and separate from the people of the United States, going down into its coffers and conferring largess and benefactions upon the people of the country. Why, sirs, what is the Federal Government? It is only the agency of the people of the United States created by the people for the use and benefit of the people; and as long as it serves the people it has a right to exist. When it ceases to serve the people there will no longer be excuse for its existence.

Whence came these benefactions that the Government has been conferring upon the people? From whom were they obtained? What benefit, what largess, what charity did the Government bestow upon the people of the United States when it established the rural routes? It took some of the people's money and expended it for the benefit of the people. That is what it did, and that is all that it did. I greatly fear that, if the Senator from Kansas lives much longer down here in Washington, he will really conclude that he is the Government of the United States, and that when he votes the people's money for the benefit of the people he is conferring a special favor upon them and bearing the expense himself.

Mr. President, this is the people's money. These roads are to be used by the Government in the exercise of its agency for the people.

The only question that ought to be discussed here is whether this plan is the best one we are able to conceive.

I started to say a while ago, and I say now, that I do not profess to claim that this is necessarily a perfect measure. Objections can be made to any bill that is offered; every scheme and plan that can be devised will be met with objections; but all we can do, as human beings, is to thrash out these objections, reason together, and try to arrive at a just conclusion.

It has been argued here that this plan will involve a vast amount of Federal inspection; it has been urged that the money will be wasted; and in that argument the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has taken a conspicuous part; yet I hold in my hand a bill introduced in the House of Representatives by the Senator from Mississippi when a Member of that body. I challenge attention to his bill, and I ask the Senator now if it is not open to many, if not all of the objections that have been insistently advanced against the bill under consideration? The Williams bill was introduced in 1907, and I compliment the Senator from Mississippi upon the fact that at that early day he was interested in the Federal Government assisting in the building of roads. I shall not read the bill in a spirit of criticism, but rather to show that it contains some of the very provisions contained in the bill under discussion which the Senator has to-night so vigorously criticized. That bill provided:

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States, and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury, the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.
> SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide immediately for the distribution of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia—

I pause there long enough to say that that means an unequal division among the States—more unequal than would result probably if the money was distributed according to the mileage of rural routes that are improved; but it is a minor criticism. The division had to be based on something, and I do not think that a bad basis. I read again:

> to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities, and shall prorate the same accordingly, for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, like the present bill, the Senator based the distribution upon the fact that the Government had established the postal routes of the country. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pursue his investigations further, he will find that the gentleman from Mississippi, at that time a Member of the House of Representatives, after that introduced another bill as a substitute for that, for the purpose of correcting the glaring inequalities of basing the distribution per capita, and provided in the subsequent bill that in computing the population of each State the population of cities of 50,000 souls and over should be subtracted from the total.

Mr. REED. Very well. The statement of the Senator simply shows that I was wrong a little while ago when I said he never changed his mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi is notorious for changing his mind whenever a sound argument is presented.

Mr. REED. Very well; let it rest at that. The bill proceeds:

> For the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide.

That left the distribution to the governments of the States, and the governments of the States could provide for distributing it among the road overseers if they saw fit without any limitation, without any restriction, without any protection as far as we have thus far got in the bill. There is more of the bill, and I am going to be fair and read the rest of it:

> And said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.
> SEC. 3. That should any State, Territory, or District divert said funds for any purpose other than the improvement of the postal roads that they shall not be allowed to participate in any further distribution of said funds until said State shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that a like amount so diverted has been expended from the treasury of said State, Territory, or District, so diverting the same in a judicious manner upon the postal roads of said State, Territory, or District diverting the same.
> SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November, each year, what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

Here we have been challenged because this bill did not provide for cooperation, that was said, although the first proposition of the present bill is that there must be not only cooperation, but that cooperation must be in advance and must bring the work up to a certain standard. But in the bill which was introduced by the learned and distinguished Senator, then the leader of the House of Representatives, provided for absolutely turning this money over to the various States and left it to the local authorities to expend it upon roads, how, when, and where they would, and did not require contribution or cooperation to any extent whatever. And yet the bill does the Senator honor, because he was a pioneer in this great scheme; at least in the revival of this great scheme that found expression in that provision of the Constitution which provided for the establishment of post roads.

Now, Mr. President, if it was wise and prudent when the Senator from Mississippi introduced his bill to turn the Government's money over to the several States, not in proportion to the mileage of their roads, not in proportion to the extent of their territory, not in proportion to the density of their population, but in proportion to population, what becomes of the argument that this bill is unjust, because under it those States with large populations, large area, and large rural-route mileage will receive more money than the States with small area, population, and rural mileage?

Mr. President, I have quoted this bill for the purpose of showing that no plan can be devised even by the wise and cunning brain of my good friend, the Senator from Mississippi, whom I so much admire, which does not contain the very inequalities of the present bill against which he so dramatically inveighs.

Mr. President, one word further. They tell us that this money will be expended by road overseers, and that road overseers will squander it. I will answer that argument now. I do not know why men should go outside of the record in a case to argue matter that never was put in evidence. I do not know why men, in arguing a bill, should go outside the plain terms of the bill and discuss something that is not contained within its four corners. The fact of the matter is, that the provision of this bill requires the road overseer or the authority that has charge of the road, by whatsoever name known, to bring these roads up to a given standard and to maintain them at that standard. That embraces the cooperation of the States. That does away with any possibility of the road overseers squandering the money. That gives you the result in advance. After you have the result, after the goods, if you please, are laid upon the counter, you pay. To abandon my poor metaphor and stick to the text, after the road has been laid out, improved, and kept in condition then there goes into the funds of that district this little premium for the improvement of the roads. What is wrong with that?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator finishes his argument, in order that we may have a clear comprehension of the facts in dispute as to the cost of roads I desire to state that I have here the department's bulletin of February 29, 1912, showing the mileage and cost of public roads in the United States of the standard type of sand and clay, the gravel, and the macadam road, and if the Senator will allow me I will read the figures as to just a few States.

In Alabama the sand and clay road costs $680 per mile to construct up to the standard; in California, $412; in Florida, $829; in Georgia, $387; in Kansas, $785; in South Carolina, $415. I believe Georgia was the lowest. The average cost of construction of a standard, well-kept sand and clay road in the 34 States enumerated is $723 per mile.

Now, here is your gravel road. In some of the States it costs only $940 per mile, but, taking into consideration that in some places the gravel is scarce, the average is $2,000 for the gravel road. For the macadam road it is as low in some States as $2,000 and as high in some as $7,000, but the average is only $4,000 per mile. The bituminous used on streets costs $10,000; I suppose that was the road the Senator from Massachusetts was referring to. I just thought I would give these official figures in order that the Senator's argument might contain the exact facts.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for these figures. They are very illuminating. Mr. President, I have very little to add, except that I want to drive home the argument that this money is not given to road overseers to waste. I repeat that the money is paid after the work is done and inspected. Let us, then, make an end of the talk that the money will be wasted by rural overseers—not because of my assertion, but because it is the plain language of the instrument itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from Missouri goes farther—and I very much dislike to disturb him——

Mr. REED. You do not disturb me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has read a bill which I introduced some time in 1907, and in justice to myself I want to say a few words right here concerning it. It will not take me long. This bill, Mr. President, was my first; somewhat crude groping for a plan to help any good-road construction throughout the United States. One reason why it was drawn as it was is because at that time the Government had a very considerable surplus, so that two ideas contributed in the construction of the bill. One the old ideas of the distribution of the surplus to the States, which is familiar to the history of our country, and the other the construction of roads. The Senator will notice this bill only applies so long as there is a surplus in the Treasury. Now, when you come to the idea of returning a surplus to the States, it is but right and proper that the surplus should be returned per capita, no matter for what purpose it is returned.

Later on I introduced a bill which more nearly expresses my present convictions, although even that did not do it. I would not reintroduce this bill to-day, nor would I the last bill which I introduced in the House. So far from its being difficult for me to change my opinion, I find it rather difficult to keep from changing it too often as I grow older and learn more. Finally I introduced a bill which differed from this in this respect: First, that in computing the population of the States, being no longer a distribution of the surplus, but the main object being the roads, cities containing over a certain number of souls should be deducted. I have forgotten whether it was fifty or one hundred thousand. Then I had likewise come to the conclusion that I had made another error in the bill, and that was in not providing that the aid extended by the Federal Government should not be above a certain percentage of what was paid out by the local authorities. I, therefore, provided that the Government should not pay the money into the State treasury unless the State made a satisfactory showing of having spent twice that much; in other words, the Federal Government would be contributing 50 per cent of the total cost and after the work was done.

To-day, if I were to introduce another bill, I would change the proportion to be paid. I would have the Federal Government contribute only one-third, and the State one-third, and the local community, county, or town one-third. But I would keep the other provisions of the bill, and especially this provision which the Senator from Missouri does not seem to have understood the reason for. I do not think the Federal Government ought to go into a State and build or repair roads.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that its agency in that respect should be confined to helping the States do the work. Now, believing that, I did not want to concoct any sort of machinery by means of which the Federal Government could undertake to visit a penalty upon a State or by means of which it could tarnish or hurt the good name of a State. Nor did I, upon the other side, want the State to accept money for one purpose and use it for another, as was notoriously done under the swamp-land grant act of our early history. I, therefore, wanted the Federal Government to keep a string upon the State, but with due respect to its absolute sovereignty. I, therefore, provided that where a State did not show to the Secretary of the Treasury—and in my later bill I believe I changed it to the Secretary of Agriculture where the Good Roads Bureau was, but to the Federal authority at any rate—that the money had been expended for roads and had not been diverted to other purposes, then that particular State should not receive any more money until it had restored that money to the roads of the State. Just the same provision that is in this bill. I say that merely in justice to my own position upon that bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Mississippi is highly proper. He misapprehends my attitude, however, if he thinks that I do not fully understand the importance of the States retaining absolute control over their own highways, without any interference by the Federal Government. That is one of the features of this bill that commends it very strongly to me. But, Mr. President, this is the basic fact with reference to the expenditure of that money under the bill which we are now considering, or under the bill of the Senator from Mississippi, or under any of these measures, that unless the Federal Government does enter the State and does do the work, a thing which we, at least the Senator from Mississippi and I would not consent to, and I am sure our associates on this side of the Chamber would not, then the expenditure of that money must be left to the local authorities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree absolutely with the Senator about that, nor have I directed any criticism on that ground.

Mr. REED. I understand that. The laws of the State must govern and the State through such agencies as it may create will build its own roads and use this money. Therefore it is no argument against this bill that this money might be wasted by a local authority, because that would be true of any other bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it can be prevented from going on by stopping it.

Mr. REED. It is entirely proper, if any State should misuse this money, to add such a provision as there was in the House bill introduced by the Senator, that the money should not thereafter be paid.

Mr. President, these interruptions have led me to take up more time than I had intended to take. I have simply this to say in conclusion. I am not willing that this important legislation should be laid aside to take further advice from the Commissioner of Roads of the United States. My experience with heads of departments is that when you get through with all the learning and wisdom they can bring to your aid you know less about the proposition than you would if you had started out on your own motion to collect the facts. I do not belong to that class of men who think that the appointment of a man to an office with a high-sounding title confers wisdom upon him. I believe that the Congressmen called in from all parts of the United States and knowing their local communities, and the wants of those communities, the kind and character of soil, and the topography of their States, know as much about what is necessary as some one man selected by the Government can possibly know. I say again when that man comes in and tells me that it will take a thousand dollars a mile to maintain a rock road that under the figures just read by my friend from South Carolina only cost $4,000 a mile, it seems to me we had better have a committee of Congress appointed to instruct the Commissioner of Roads rather than have him attempt to instruct Congress.

Now, let us see what can be accomplished by this bill, what its effect will be. The money provided will not build these roads. Nobody claims that. What will the bill do? It will be a notice to every community, every township, every road district in the United States, that if they will bring their roads up to a little better standard and put a little more work on them than they are now doing they will get this premium. It will stimulate their energies, it will arouse their ambition; it will in the end be returned a thousand fold.

Take a sand and dirt road, such as has been described here, that costs only $400 or $500 a mile to construct. Fifteen dollars a mile will, in all human probability, go a long distance toward keeping that road in repair. As suggested to me by the Senator from South Carolina, it would pay half of the interest on the bonds. I am not familiar with that kind of road, because we do not have many of them in my State, but I am familiar with the dirt road that is kept up to a high standard by dragging and by ditching, and $150 a year will, in my opinion, pay for the dragging of 10 miles of that kind of road. If it will not entirely pay for it, it will pay a large per cent of it.

Thus the incentive will constantly be kept before every community of the United States to improve its roads. That means an added interest, an interest that is nation wide. It means arousing the ambition from one end of the country to the other. When once started, the movement for good roads will go on. Soon people will not be satisfied to live upon a road that is not reasonably passable. When once gravel or shell roads have been constructed in a portion of the community, they will surely be extended, until in the end, in many years, perhaps, still in a short space of time measured by the great achievement that lies before us, we will have throughout this country a network of roads that will reach every hamlet and village and almost every farm; all roads will be passable, and many of them will be beautiful and splendid highways.

Mr. President, one advantage of this plan is that the money will not be expended in one spot. It will not be used up to build one great automobile thoroughfare. It will not be put at some portion of a county or State that is remote from the great body of the population as one road must necessarily be, but it will reach into every community and it will stimulate the ambition of every portion of the people.

I do not say it is a perfect plan; I do not claim that it can not be improved upon; but I do say that it seems to me to be a working plan, a fair way to start, and that when we have once started upon this great scheme it will develop and prove an immense benefit to this country. I said awhile ago, in effect, and I repeat now, the blessings will flow to all parts of the country. If there is one thing to-day against which our people cry it is the enormous cost of living. One element of that cost is the farm products. The man who examines the statistics of this country will find that while our city population is mounting with wonderful rapidity there has been an actual decline in the rural population of some of the best agricultural States. That is, in part, because boys and girls reared upon the farm are not willing to stay where they have no decent means of reaching the city, and hence are denied all the pleasures of town life. If you will give the people of this country good roads, telephone connections, the service of interurban cars, you will soon find that the population will flow back to the country. The cost of transporting goods to the market will be cheaper. So in the end every citizen of the city, as well as every inhabitant of the country, will get his share of benefit.

We have been doing a great deal in this country for railroads. We have been granting franchises of inestimable value to great corporations that operate in the cities. I am making no complaint of that at this time. We have been so regulating the charges for carriage that the great cities are built up at the expense of the small country village, and as its commercial life blood is drained the country suffers correspondingly.

And now it is asked that we confer a small portion of the benefits of government upon the farmers of the United States, that great class of men who in the sweat of their brows and the labor of their hands have laid the foundations of our national greatness. We should deal with them justly and generously.

I favor the provision of the House bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we have been in session a very long time to-day, and have now been in session something over two hours to-night. There are Senators here who are anxious to be heard upon this proposition. Those of us who are in favor of the House provision are deeply in earnest about it. There has been an effort to laugh out of court, so to speak, the provision in the House bill. We believe that the more thoroughly that provision is discussed the more it will impress itself upon the Senate. We desire full and ample time for its discussion.

I trust, as anxious as the Senator from Oregon is to get his bill to a final vote and anxious as he is to get a vote upon this proposition, he will not press to an early conclusion this debate. I hope he will consent that every Senator shall have ample time to present his views on this question. As I said, we are in earnest about it. There are more people in the United States I believe interested in this proposition than in any other matter pending before this session of Congress.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to state that I have no wish or intention to shut off debate in the consideration of this subject. I am anxious to get the bill to passage as rapidly as possible, but not to stifle debate in any way.

I realize that we have had a long session to-day. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he has any idea of the length of time that will be required, from his knowledge of the situation and of the number of Senators expected to speak upon the bill, for the further consideration of this particular item?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think we could finish this discussion to-morrow unless more time than we expect is taken in connection with the impeachment trial. I do not feel that we ought to consent to any limitation of debate upon this matter. I think it is too important. I believe we ought to discuss it so long as anyone wishes to speak upon it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that we have an understanding that we will take up this provision to-morrow when the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill, and that it be understood that we will continue the discussion of the provision until it is disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. That will be satisfactory to me. I simply meant that I do not desire any limitation to be placed on the debate.

Mr. BOURNE. I assume that course will be agreeable.

Mr. PENROSE. Would the Senator from North Carolina object to a unanimous-consent agreement fixing a time to vote on this provision, say, to-morrow at a quarter before 2 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think we can agree upon an hour to-morrow, because we can not tell how much of our time to-morrow will be taken up with the impeachment trial.

Mr. SWANSON. I would not consent at this time to such an arrangement, for the simple reason that there are other provisions in the bill. I think to-morrow possibly we can reach a conclusion and take a vote on this provision. It must be remembered that we are now proceeding as in Committee of the Whole, and if any agreement should be reached now and the debate had not been completed, if everyone had not spoken who desired to speak, it would simply be continued when the bill was reported to the Senate. I think we had as well dispose of the amendment now as to have it thrashed out twice.

Mr. BOURNE. Then, Mr. President, I wish to announce that I shall ask unanimous consent, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, to resume the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

I now move that the Senate——

Mr. SWANSON. Pending the motion, I wish to make a little correction, if the Senator from Oregon will yield to me for just one minute.

Mr. BOURNE. Very well.

Mr. SWANSON. In making some estimates, while the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] had the floor, as to the amount some States would receive, they were made hurriedly by myself. I have had them made by some one else who is much more accurate at figures than myself. The estimate made is that Iowa would receive $911,025, Mississippi would receive $338,415, and

New York would receive $763,350. That is the estimate made by a very accurate person, who can figure much better than I can on these matters.

I also wish to say in addition——

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator from Virginia, having told us how much the States would receive, be good enough to tell us just how much they would pay?

Mr. SWANSON. It is impossible to determine how much they would pay.

Mr. BAILEY. It is a poor partnership that enables us to say how much we are going to take out without also enabling us to say how much we are going to put in.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has not followed that course himself in the appropriations made for Texas. I do not think that he has estimated how much the United States would pay for river and harbor improvements in Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not want to have the Virginia rule applied to Texas.

Mr. SWANSON. The State would be much improved if the Virginia rule was applied to Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Texas will be the judge of that.

Mr. SWANSON. She has been the judge, and so will Virginia be. The best part of Texas is made up of Virginians.

Mr. BAILEY. As soon as we get a Virginian down there we make a Texan out of him, and he never goes back to Virginia except on a visit.

Mr. SWANSON. We have had a number who have come to Virginia from Texas and they have always remained in Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. Having been born in Virginia they had sense enough to leave it.

Mr. SWANSON. They seem to be glad to get back to Virginia. I do not think, even in humor and in good nature, the Senator felt what he said about Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. No; Mr. President, I do not. I cherish a great reverence for that ancient Commonwealth, for all her people, and for none of them more than for the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to heartily reciprocate the compliment just bestowed by the Senator from Texas.

Now, Mr. President, there is another statement I wish to make so that we can be considering it. When I spoke this afternoon and said the bill prorated the amount of money according to the condition of the roads for the year, I had an idea it was for the entire year before anything could be received. One of the Members of the House who aided in preparing the bill, who is one of the best lawyers I know, and an able judge, has a contrary opinion. On his statement presented to me I have reached the conclusion he did, that it would be prorated according to the month, or time the roads were kept in good condition during the year.

As that seems to be ambiguous, I think an amendment should be made that would make the policy one way or the other clear and distinct. This provision of the House is before the Senate for amendment for improvement, for perfection, and I should like to have those gentlemen who antagonize it one way or the other offer an amendment to carry out their views in this respect. I think it prorates it, and I think the language is sufficiently clear for that purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] differs from the Senator from Virginia. I hope the Senator will prepare an amendment to make that clear.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from Oregon will withhold his motion to adjourn.

Mr. BOURNE. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. At the request of several Senators who desire to have nominations acted on to-night, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 3, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 2, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Rev. William Couden, of Norwalk, Ohio, as follows:

Again, O God, Thou layest upon us the solemn trust of a day. How fair it drops upon us from Thy hand! We pray that Thou wilt comfort us with the sense of Thine all-searching presence and never-failing strength. Illumine our minds and hearts and wills with the light that radiates through Thy Son, our Savior Jesus Christ. Make us faithful to our Nation, our homes, our friends, our fellow men, and our own manhood, and enable us to put back into Thine eternal keeping these hours of service, all untarnished by sin. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS ON INVESTIGATION OF STEEL TRUST.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the committee to investigate violations of the act of 1890, and other acts, I desire to submit the following report (H. Rept. 1127).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky sends up a report from the committee to investigate the Steel Trust. It is ordered printed and put on the calendar.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have the usual time of five days in which to file the minority views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks that the minority may have five days in which to file their views. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I send up a supplemental report of my own from the minority.

The SPEAKER. Is this the minority report?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. It is one of the minority reports.

Mr. MANN. It is one of the minority reports.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not have any official information that there were more than one. It is ordered printed and put on the calendar.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present my separate views on the steel investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois sends up his views, which are ordered printed and put on the calendar. The Chair will suggest to whoever has charge of these things that these reports ought to be printed together. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Michigan if this is all of them?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. No, Mr. Speaker; Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts will present a report which is agreed on by three members, at least, of the committee; but he does not seem to be in his seat this morning.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether that report is likely to be presented to-day?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. It is ready now.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that, when presented, all the reports be printed together.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Might it not be just as well to leave that matter open until Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts is present, which will be during the day?

The SPEAKER. Very well, then.

Subsequently,

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I present a report containing the views of the minority of the special committee elected to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a document separate from the main report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURLEY). The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] submits a minority report of the committee on the investigation of the Steel Trust and asks that it be printed as a separate document. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. (H. Rept. 1127, pt. 2.)

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15509. An act to authorize the construction and maintenance of a sewer pipe upon and across the Fort Rodman Military Reservation at New Bedford, Mass.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 25069) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONFERENCE REPORT, MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 24450, the Military Academy appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report on the Military Academy bill and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1122).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24450) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 11, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 11 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, after the word "hereafter," strike out the word "graduates" and insert in lieu the words "a graduate"; in line 13, after the word "from," strike out the words "West Point, N. Y.," and insert in lieu the words "his home"; in line 14, after the word "which," strike out the words "they first join" and insert in lieu the words "he first joins"; and in line 14, beginning after the word "duty," strike out all the rest of the amendment down to and including the word "strength," in line 28; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment, after the word "sergeant," strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu the word "eight"; in line 4, after the word "sergeants," strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu the word "ten"; in line 4, after the word "musicians," strike out the word "forty" and insert in lieu the words "thirty-eight"; and in line 5, after the word "and," strike out the word "forty" and insert in lieu the words "thirty-eight"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. A. DU PONT,
F. E. WARREN,
JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 24450 submit the following statement:

Amendment No. 1 provides for the appointment of two cadets from the District Columbia and for mileage to graduates of West Point when ordered to their stations; it also provides for a new method of appointment of cadets to West Point. The House agreed to the first two provisions of the amendment and refused to agree to the last provision and receded with an amendment.

Amendment No. 2 provides for two assistant professors in the department of English and history, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 3 makes a verbal correction, and the House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 4 and 5 provide that the engineer detachment now at West Point shall remain there permanently, and the House recedes with an amendment increasing the sergeants and corporals by four and cutting off four privates.

Amendment No. 6 dispenses with the name of the typewriter authorized, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 7 makes a verbal change, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 8 gives to the Secretary of War the authority to grant leave of absence to the Superintendent of the Military Academy, and the House recedes.

Amendment No. 10 struck out the House provision for the relief of Lieut. Col. J. M. Carson, and the Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 11 provides for the promotion of Col. Wilcox, a professor at the academy, and the House recedes.

JAMES HAY,
JAMES L. SLAYDEN,
GEO. W. PRINCE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was adopted.

RIGHT FOR ELECTRIC RAILROAD, ETC., ACROSS VANCOUVER MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Senate bill 4663 and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report, which the Clerk will read, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation the right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation in the State of Washington.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1072).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right of way for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. A. DU PONT,
F. E. WARREN,
JOS. F. JOHNSTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House make the following statement with regard to the action of the conferees on S. 4663:

The amendments of the House Nos. 1 and 2 struck out of the Senate bill the words "the right" and the word "grant" and inserted the word "license," and the Senate receded.

The House inserted the words "at the discretion of the Secretary of War" in place of the words "during the pleasure of Congress," and the House recedes.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The question was taken, and the report was adopted.

IRON AND STEEL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to return the papers on the bill amending the iron and steel schedule to the House, reporting a disagreement on the part of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 18642. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] reports a disagreement on the part of the conferees on the bill H. R. 18642.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to take the steel bill (H. R. 18642) from the Speaker's table and further insist on the disagreement of the House to Senate amendments Nos. 3 and 4. Senate amendment No. 3 is an amendment repealing the Canadian reciprocity pact and Senate amendment No. 4 is merely a technical amendment renumbering the bill.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the amendments?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Senate amendments Nos. 3 and 4. Senate amendments Nos. 1 and 2 have already been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Are these two amendments the only ones pending?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only ones pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 18642, and to further insist on the disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know as I have any objection to the action proposed to be taken, but is not this a conference report that, under the rules, would have to be printed in the RECORD? The bill is not on the Speaker's table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is there now, because I returned it there.

Mr. MANN. That action does not return it to the Speaker's table. It is in the custody of the House and not of the Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not agree to that. The proper place for it is to go to the Speaker's table, and there is no conference report in the matter. The gentleman would be accurate if there was a conference report to be acted upon. But it is the custom and precedent of the House when the total disagreement is reported that there is no action required by the House. We therefore have no conference report to act upon, and the reading of the rule clearly establishes the fact that the purpose of the report and statement is to indicate to the House the points at issue between the conferees. The report made does not require action by the House. I do not desire to call up any report. I merely move to take from the Speaker's table the bill, and I think, Mr. Speaker, my motion is clearly in order and I insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois, when this comes back here in this shape, is it or is it not in the exact position it was when it was first taken from the Speaker's table?

Mr. MANN. If the bill had come from the Senate it would go to the Speaker's table for reference to a committee. The bill has been to the committee and is not on the Speaker's table now. It is a conference report reported back from the committee and is in possession of the House, and like any other bill that is in the possession of the House is in the hands of the Clerk. I wish the gentleman would not precipitate a question of that kind. He could get what he wants by unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am going to insist on the motion because I think I am correct. But if the gentleman does not want the question raised—and I think I have a right to raise the question—I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman does not want any precedent made, to ask unanimous consent to consider the iron and steel bill. The only reason I want to take it up at this time is that it will facilitate adjournment.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to taking it up. If the gentleman's contention is correct, when a conference report on the naval bill, for instance, is submitted to the House, the conference report under the rule could not be acted upon, but the amendments could be acted on. The purpose of the rule is to have the conference report printed for a day in the RECORD so that the House may have notice of what the agreement or disagreement is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that in this case there is no report.

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is a conference report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No report to be acted upon.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I say there is a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Have the two gentlemen come to an agreement about what they are going to do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would rather not take up the time of the Chair if unanimous consent is given, but otherwise I would like to argue the point of order with the Chair. But first I will ask unanimous consent that I may present the iron and steel bill to the House for the purpose of moving to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to present to the House the iron and steel bill for the purpose of disagreeing to Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4. I do not desire to discuss the question, but if gentlemen on that side do desire to discuss it I will not object.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to enter a motion to concur in the amendments regarding the reciprocity pact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves to concur in Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he desires any time?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to concur in Senate amendments numbered 3 and 4.

The question was taken, and the motion to concur was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a negative on the motion to concur carries a motion to nonconcur.

The SPEAKER. Yes; that carries the other proposition with it.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. DOUGHTON, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. WILSON of New York, for 10 days, on account of illness.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURES OF COTTON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 25034—the cotton bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I would like to see if I can reach an agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as to the time of general debate.

Mr. PAYNE. I would say to the gentleman that I do not know much about it. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] wants some time.

Mr. HILL. Yes; I would like some time, Mr. Speaker, and I understand that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] desires time, and one gentleman from Iowa, Judge GREEN, also desires time. I think altogether four or five hours would be required.

Mr. PAYNE. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HILL. I should like to have an hour and a half if I can have it.

Mr. MANN. And I would like to have half an hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree to that length of time. I am willing to agree to three hours' general debate on the bill, but I can not agree to a longer time than that.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman that this side is asking for about four hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this bill is the identical bill that was discussed for over two weeks in the House, and there is no change in it, and it is necessary to pass it in order to reach an adjournment.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman refers to the debate that was had a year ago?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And before the report of the Tariff Board came in on the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am willing to agree to three hours' general debate, and I think possibly I can yield some of my time to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HILL. Make it five hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not agree to more than three hours—an hour and a half on a side. I will endeavor to yield half an hour of that to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. LENROOT. My views not coinciding exactly with those of either the majority or minority of the committee, I dislike to ask time at the hands of either of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Three hours of debate will allow three speeches, and if it is agreed to, I will be willing to give half an hour of my time to any gentleman that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] desires me to yield it to.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have half an hour myself.

Mr. HILL. I would like to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means on the ground that under the rule each member of the committee is entitled by virtue of his membership to an hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know of any rule of that kind. I may suggest that the gentleman has brought a new rule into this House at this time. If Congress is to adjourn at an early day, I think it is important that this bill be passed to-day. I should like to see if I can come to some agreement with gentlemen on that side about the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. I understand you have a substitute. If you have, and are willing to take that substitute instead of amendments under the five-minute rule, I am willing to have a greater latitude in general debate.

Mr. PAYNE. As far as I am concerned, there is no disposition to try to make single amendments to the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. If I can get the time in general debate, I will not take any time under the five-minute rule. If I can not, I shall have to take it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly; but I want to make a reasonable agreement with gentlemen on that side, so that we can dispose of the bill to-day.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is reasonable to insist——

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest to the gentleman that we have five hours' general debate and no debate under the five-minute rule. If any amendments are offered, I do not suppose we can cut them off, but they can be decided without debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman wants five hours' general debate——

Mr. PAYNE. I should like three hours of it on this side. I do not want over 5 minutes myself, or 10 at the outside.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is enlarging his demand for time on that side. Five hours' general debate means two hours and a half on a side.

Mr. PAYNE. For myself I do not want more than 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] desires an hour and a half, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] desires an hour. I desire half an hour, which I think is a very modest request. I do not think, on a great bill like this, the gentleman should insist on cutting off reasonable debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], under the rules of the House, would be entitled to only an hour. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] would be entitled to an hour. The gentleman from Illinois says he only wants half an hour.

Mr. MANN. I would be entitled to an hour. I only want half an hour for myself. I want to yield the other half hour to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We are trying to reach an agreement, and I hope the gentleman will be reasonable about it. If we can reach an agreement for four hours' general debate, two hours and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and an hour and a half to be controlled by myself, and that the gentlemen on that side of the House shall be entitled to offer a substitute, and the previous question be ordered and the bill voted on, I will ask unanimous consent for that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole; that there be four hours' general debate, two and one-half hours of it to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], one and one-half hours to be controlled by myself; that at the end of that time the previous question shall be ordered, with the understanding that gentlemen on that side of the House may offer a substitute, and that then the vote shall be taken.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the gentleman that if he would make it half an hour more on this side I think we could reach an agreement, although that will discommode some gentlemen who are very anxious to talk on the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that we are not to have any five-minute debate, four hours and a half will carry it to 5 o'clock, and I will yield to the gentleman's wishes.

The SPEAKER. How much time does each side get? The Chair wants to know how to apportion the time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole; that there shall be four hours and one-half general debate, three hours to be controlled by the gentleman from New York, one hour and a half by myself, and that at the end of that time the gentlemen on that side of the House may have the privilege of offering a substitute, and that then the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the substitute, and the bill to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate shall continue not more than four and a half hours; that three hours of that time shall be controlled by the gentleman from New York and an hour and a half by himself; that at the end of the four hours and a half the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and the gentleman from New York shall have the privilege of offering a substitute; and that the previous question shall be ordered, both on the bill and the substitute.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if there is any Member on this side who desires to offer an amendment I shall object, but I do not desire to offer any.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There can be no objection to cutting off consideration under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LENROOT. No; and I shall not object if any Member does not wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not object, Mr. Speaker, simply because, under the statement of the gentleman from Alabama, with the majority of the House behind him, determined to cut off debate on the bill, we can accomplish nothing by it, although I think it is a very autocratic proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York to consume the greater portion of his time because the time used on this side will probably all be used in answering the arguments. I made a statement yesterday in reference to the bill, and I have no further statement to make at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, when the Democratic cotton bill was reported in the Ways and Means Committee——

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman from Connecticut will pardon me, I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] would like to address the House now, and if the gentleman from Connecticut will yield back his time I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HILL. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. PAYNE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to make brief reference to the legislative history of our country for the last half century. That history may be divided into three distinctive periods.

The first, consisting of 14 years, extended from March 4, 1861, to March 4, 1875, during which time, with the exception of President Johnson, the Republicans were in control of the Government, including the House of Representatives. That period was alive with great questions and filled with the legislative solution of progressive policies of tremendous importance. The Civil War was carried on and ended. Slavery was abolished. The Union was preserved. A tremendous army was disbanded and returned to peaceful pursuits. The homestead law was passed. The Department of Agriculture was created. Agricultural and industrial colleges were provided for by national aid. Alaska was acquired. The return of specie payments was provided for. The connection of the far east and the far west by transcontinental railroads was inaugurated and the development of the great West commenced. The system of building up American industries by the aid of a protective tariff was determined upon and carried into effect.

In spite of the tremendous loss by war, the development of the country was marvelous beyond prior conception.

The second period extends from March 4, 1875, to March 4, 1897—22 years. During that time the Democrats had control of the House of Representatives all of the time, with the exception of three two-year terms. From March 4, 1881, to March 4, 1883, from March 4, 1889, to March 4, 1891, and from March 4, 1895, to March 4, 1897, the House was Republican, but during the rest of the 22 years the House was Democratic.

The third period extends from March 4, 1897, to March 4, 1911—14 years—during which time the Republicans were in control both in the House and in the presidential office.

During these 14 years the gold financial standard was firmly established; Cuba was freed; Hawaii, Porto Rico, and other insular possessions acquired; the Department of Commerce and Labor was created; the Agricultural Department was developed and expanded; the regulation of railroads and interstate commerce was vitalized; the irrigation of arid lands by national aid was provided for; the difficulties surrounding an isthmian canal were removed, and the construction of the Panama Canal was authorized and commenced; the Navy was enlarged and really recreated; the pure-food law was enacted; white slavery was attacked by national legislation; a drastic meat-inspection law was passed; the daily hours of labor on railways was restricted; the use of many safety appliances on railroads was required; a general policy of national forests was started; conservation of natural resources was made a dominant issue; water-power sites and coal and other mineral lands reserved from exploitation; the construction of dams and bridges over navigable waters was regulated by law; rural free delivery of mail was provided for; an income-tax amendment was submitted to the States, and such an impetus was given to industrial development that the growth and expansion of material prosperity during those 14 years has never been equaled or approached in any other period of the world's history. [Applause.]

Take, for example, what was accomplished in one 10-year period.

From the year 1900 to 1910, while the population of our country increased from 76,000,000 to 92,000,000, the national wealth increased from $88,000,000,000 to $137,000,000,000.

The savings deposits increased from $2,389,000,000 to $4,070,000,000.

The postal receipts increased from $102,000,000 to $224,000,000.

The expenditures for public schools increased from $200,000,000 to $401,000,000.

The number of depositors in savings banks increased from 6,107,000 to 9,142,000.

The capital invested in manufactures increased from $8,978,000,000 to $18,237,000,000, the wages and salaries paid in manufactures increased from $2,390,000,000 to $4,353,000,000, and the products of manufactures increased from $11,411,000,000 to $20,092,000,000, these figures not including neighborhood industries or hand trades.

The materials consumed in manufactures increased from $6,577,000,000 to $11,675,000,000, the number of employees from 5,079,000 to 7,399,000, and the primary horsepower used increased from 10,098,000 to 19,065,000.

These are the figures of the census for the respective years 1900 and 1910, though as to manufactures they relate to the years 1899 and 1909.

During the same period, from 1900 to 1910, the value of the farm lands increased from $13,000,000,000 to $28,000,000,000. The value of the farm buildings from $3,556,000,000 to $6,294,000,000. The value of the farm implements and machinery from $749,000,000 to $1,261,000,000.

The exports from our country increased from $1,370,000,000 to $2,049,000,000, and in the year ending June 30, 1912, the manufactures exported from this country, not including foodstuffs, amounted to the enormous sum of over one thousand million dollars.

While from 1899 to 1909 the school population in the public graded and high schools increased only from 21,917,000 to 24,239,000, the expenses for public schools increased from $200,154,000 to $401,397,000.

In 1900 the farm value of the corn produced in the country was $751,000,000; in 1910 it was $1,523,000,000. The farm value of the wheat produced in 1900 was $323,000,000; in 1910, $621,000,000.

The farm value of oats produced in 1900 was $208,000,000; in 1910, $384,000,000. The farm value of cotton produced in 1900 was $438,000,000; in 1910, $820,000,000. The farm value of cotton seed increased from $77,000,000 during the 10 years to $142,000,000.

The value of horses in 1900 was $603,000,000; in 1910, $2,276,000,000. The value of milch cows in 1900 was $514,000,000; in 1910, $780,000,000. The value of sheep in 1900 was $122,000,000; in 1910, $233,000,000. The value of hogs in 1900 was $185,000,000; in 1910, $436,000,000.

The total value of farm animals in 1900 was $2,228,000,000; in 1910, $5,138,000,000.

The total value on the farm of farm productions in 1900 was $5,017,000,000; in 1910, $8,926,000,000.

The total production of coal in 1900 was 240,000,000 long tons; in 1910, 477,000,000.

The total production of pig iron in 1900 was 13,789,000 tons; in 1910, 27,298,000 tons.

The production of petroleum in 1900 was 2,672,000,000 gallons; in 1910, 8,801,000,000 gallons.

Nothing so marvelous in increase of production and prosperity was ever before known. The wise legislation put upon the statute books by the Republican Party, including the Dingley tariff law, was largely responsible. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We point with swelling pride to the policies adopted, the legislation enacted, and the achievements consummated during the two periods of Republican control; but who points with pride to things accomplished during the 16 years that the Democrats had charge of the House. Then, as now, they were engaged in seeking to break down the governmental policies which produced prosperity, were carrying on useless and expensive investigations productive of no good, and generally engaged in a program of faultfinding.

The present Democratic majority in this House has now disclosed its intentions. It has advertised its purposes. It has declared its will. It speaks for the Democratic Party through its concrete acts, and that party is bound by those acts.

The Democrats have already passed four tariff bills through this House at this session. A fifth is now proposed. They are all free-trade or tariff-for-revenue-only bills. They all abandon completely the theory of protection. The friends of the bills admit this.

Those bills all lower the rates of duties on imported articles, but contemplate increased importations to produce the revenue.

The authors of these bills insist that the tariff rates fixed in them are based solely upon the idea of producing revenue, even though such rates will not equal the difference between the actual cost of production in this country and foreign countries.

These bills, therefore, are intended to encourage importations, to give comfort and aid to foreign manufacturers, to help pay the taxes in foreign lands, to give labor to foreign workmen and help pay the wages of foreign laborers, to build up and make thriving foreign communities, to aid in the consumption of foreign raw materials, to do for foreign lands what patriotic statesmen strive to do for their own country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The metal bill would increase our importations of foreign ores, would add greatly to the quantity of manufactured metals brought to us from foreign shores, and would deliver the trade in our seacoast cities to the foreigners.

The chemical bill puts a tariff tax upon raw materials not produced here, but coming from tropical countries, while at the same time reducing the tariff on the manufactured finished products in which such raw materials are used, thus cutting off from our home manufacturer at both ends.

The sugar bill would drive out our own cane sugar, would prevent the growth of our beet-sugar industry, and injure, if not ruin, those now engaged in the production of raw sugar in this country.

The wool bill would largely destroy sheep raising by us, would make us dependent upon foreign lands for our wool in time of peace, and might make us do without in time of war. It would largely drive our woolen factories to foreign shores.

These Democratic tariff bills would add many new factories in the lands of our foreign competitors, but not one in our own country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

They would give employment to many additional people in other lands, but to no one here.

They would send our money abroad to pay the wages of foreign workmen, but would bring despair to the hearts of those seeking employment here.

They would add to wages paid abroad; they would add to idle labor here; they would add to the growth of manufacturing abroad and to the number of labor strikes here; they would add happiness to the foreign laborer and cause notices of decrease of wages to the American laborer; they would open mills over there and close mills here; they would bring a smile of contentment abroad and a wail of despair here.

That they would for a time reduce prices I do not deny. They would thereby destroy the small producer here, even if the larger trusts and combinations were able to survive.

The reduction in prices would mean cutting off the profits and cutting down the wages; would mean strikes and riots and starvation and hell for the wage earner and his family, destruction for the manufacturer, and damnation for the home industry, to be followed by a rise in prices for the benefit of the trusts here and the foreign producers, while many of our own people would still be out of employment and without sufficient means to buy at higher or lower prices. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I quote from Genesis:

> And Jacob sod pottage: and Esau came from the field, and he was faint:
> And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage; for I am faint: therefore was his name called Edom.
> And Jacob said, Sell me this day thy birthright.
> And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die: and what profit shall this birthright do to me?
> And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he sware unto him: and he sold his birthright unto Jacob.
> Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentiles; and he did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way: thus Esau despised his birthright. (Verses 29 to 34, ch. XXV, Book of Genesis.)

Our birthright is the right to be industrious, the right to labor, the right to produce, the right to have, the right to earn, the right to live in comfort, the right to be happy, the right to feed and clothe and shelter our wives and our children, the right to consume what others produce, and the right to produce what others shall consume—the right to live and work on the scale of American citizenship and civilization.

The Democratic Party would trade off this birthright of the American people, this basic principle of permanent happiness and success, for the mess of pottage of temporary cheaper prices, caused by increasing importations of foreign goods. Such statesmanship would eat the seed corn instead of planting it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If Democratic victory shall become assured and Democratic policies be enacted into law, we will again walk through the valley of the shadow of death, again learn the value and troubles of painful economy, again experience the pangs of desperate hunger, again witness the desolation of idle mills and silenced machinery.

But, though temporary Democratic success may injure, it can not destroy our land.

Though the clouds of fatuous Democratic policies may gather thick and black, though despair may fill the air, though destruction may threaten farm and factory interests, miner and magnate, the permanent resources of our country will remain. The sun will still continue to shed its light and heat. The rich fertility of the soil will still be there. The rains and the dews will not stop. The wealth of minerals beneath the surface will continue to invite the enterprise and ingenuity of man and urge that they be made use of in providing the necessities, the comforts, and the luxuries of civilized life. The unused bounties of nature will not vanish.

And reason will regain its throne. Hope will revive. Men will again realize that no theories or policies of statecraft will enable them to sell what they produce at high prices and to buy what they consume at low prices; that the country at large must be prosperous and busy if individuals shall thrive; that factories and farms go hand in hand to success or to adversity; that prosperous mills and mines are dependent each upon the other; that order and stability of law, policies, and business are essential to the growth and maintenance of contented society, happy homes, work for all, and a prosperous country.

And with this realization will come a renewed faith in the Republican Party, its leaders, and its policies. [Applause on the Republican side.] Confidence will be restored in the land; the hearts of the people will swell. They will put forth renewed effort.

The enterprise, the ingenuity, the inventive genius, the honest toil of man will combine with the accumulated wealth of the past and the unbounded plenteousness of the resources of nature to again make the wheels of the machinery of industrial prosperity hum and whir in the midst of a happy, a contented, a busy, a well-paid, and a prosperous people, represented by a Republican House and a Republican administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Republican Party—its memories are too sacred, its principles are too righteous and too enduring, its achievements are too inspiring and too lasting, its record is too grand, its need to the country is too great, its leadership and its membership are too patriotic and too filled with hope for the country for it to be destroyed by the assaults of its enemies from without or within. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It will continue its organization and its work with renewed vitality, with continued loyalty, the possessor of a noble past and with a wonderful future of deeds to be accomplished lying before it.

It will not die. It will not cease. It will go on and on, with heroic devotion to the principles of constitutional government and with continued faith that our right-thinking people will maintain order and preserve equality and prosperity. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURLEY). The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, when the cotton bill was considered before the Committee on Ways and Means I offered a substitute for the Democratic proposition. Since that time there has been some change in the phraseology but not in the rates of the substitute. I will ask the pages to distribute among the Members copies of the bill, which I have brought up to date, and my hope is that without many changes it may be finally offered as a substitute for the Democratic bill. I am for the improvement of this schedule. My reason for distributing the substitute now is that I wish to refer to it and the Underwood bill in the progress of the discussion.

Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 1911, the President of the United States sent to the Congress a veto of a bill identical in every respect, except the dates, with the one now under consideration.

In that message he said:

> The bill would not go into effect, by its terms, until January 1 next, and before that time a full report to be submitted to Congress by the Tariff Board, based upon the most thorough investigation, will show the comparative cost of all the elements of production in the manufacture of cotton in this and other countries. The investigation by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House did not cover the facts showing this comparative cost, for the reason that the committee was preparing a bill on a tariff-for-revenue basis, and their view of a proper tariff was avowedly at variance with the theory of protection. Pledged to support a policy of moderate protection, I can not approve a measure which violates its principle. * * *
> When the reports of the Tariff Board upon these schedules are received, the duties which should be imposed can be determined upon justly and with intelligent appreciation of the effect that they will have both upon industry and upon revenue. Very likely some of the changes in this bill will prove desirable and some to be undesirable. So far as they turn out to be just and reasonable I shall be glad to approve them, but at present the proposed legislation appears to be all a matter of guesswork. The important thing is to get our tariff legislation out of the slough of guesswork and logrolling and ex parte statements of interested persons and to establish that legislation on the basis of tested and determined facts, to which shall be applied, fairly and openly, whatever tariff principle the people of the country choose to adopt.

On March 28, 1912, the President sent to Congress another message, from which I quote:

> In several messages to Congress I have expressed my wish for a revision of the present tariff schedule by schedule when justified by an adequate knowledge of facts regarding each industry, as shown by an impartial and nonpartisan inquiry. In order to secure such an impartial inquiry into the facts I established, under the authority vested in me by law, a Tariff Board of five members. On December 20, 1911, I transmitted to the Congress a report of the board on Schedule K (wool and manufactures of). The board was unanimous in its findings of fact, and on the basis of these findings I recommended a revision of that schedule.
> I now transmit a report of the Tariff Board on Schedule I (cotton manufactures). In this report, also, the board is unanimous in its findings. On the basis of the report I now recommend that the Congress proceed to a consideration of this schedule, with a view to its revision and a reduction of its rates.
> I base this recommendation on the declaration of the platform on which I was elected—that a reasonable protective tariff should be adjusted to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

Reviewing the work of the board on this schedule, he closed as follows:

> These matters are set forth fully in the report of the board, which presents in impartial manner the necessary facts on which an intelligent revision of this schedule can be based.
> I therefore recommend that the Congress proceed to such a revision without delay.

Loyalty to a Republican administration, to the platform of my party, and to the constituency which sent me here seemed to demand that at least a thorough study of the report should be made, for the investigation had been an exhaustive one and had cost a large amount of time and money. Feeling my own unfitness for the work, I called to my assistance several of the experts who had conducted the investigation, and after many weary days of careful study a new Schedule I was constructed, which, if the report of the Tariff Board as to American costs is correct, is protective in every item and yet is in strict accord with the Republican platform as to the elimination of excessive duties, while still preserving the security against foreign competion to which American producers and wageworkers are entitled.

GUESSWORK OF TARIFF MAKING.

It is no light task to adjust the rates of a tariff schedule to the basic facts of a great industry like this. It is far easier to guess at them, as our Democratic friends have done, their only object being to guess, first, as to the amount of money needed to meet expenditures not yet incurred, and, second, to guess again as to the rates which will be most productive on importations, the amount of which must also be the subject of further guessing.

In such a task the first thought of a Republican must be the preservation and encouragement of the competing domestic industry, the maintenance of the home standard of living, and the scale of wages which a distinctively American civilization demands.

The first thought of a Democrat who honestly believes in the modern idea of a tariff for revenue only must be to encourage foreign purchases by domestic consumers and to tax the imported articles up to the point of the greatest revenue, but always below the point where the added cost will give to the home producer the chance of successful competition. It was on this basis that this Democratic cotton bill was framed, as shown by the chairman of the committee, when in response to the question of Mr. HINDS, of Maine, whether this bill "left out entirely the principle of protection," Mr. UNDERWOOD replied, "Absolutely, so far as my knowledge is concerned." The facts since ascertained and agreed to and certified in writing by the cotton manufacturers from the Northern and Southern States alike show beyond the possibility of impeachment that in some of the rates of the Democratic bill excessive, ineffective, and uselessly protective duties are found, and in others duties so low as to compel the transfer of portions of the industry to foreign countries.

It is the bud, the flower, and the full fruition of the guesswork process of tariff making, the wonder being that any of the guesses of 1911 are even partially sustained by the facts of 1912.

THE SUBSTITUTE BILL.

The bill which was offered in committee as a substitute for the Democratic cotton schedule revision is a protective measure in every item of it, as will be easily seen by examination of the report of the Tariff Board. It is based upon the bedrock foundation of American costs, and as evidence of the accuracy with which these were taken I submit the following statement of Mr. H. C. Emery, chairman of the board, written in response to my inquiry concerning the methods employed:

> THE TARIFF BOARD,
> Treasury Building, Washington, May 25, 1912.
> Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL,
> House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
> MY DEAR MR. HILL: Referring to your questions in conversation with Mr. Cowgill regarding the accuracy of the cost figures in our cotton report and your request that a statement be made in writing, I beg to say that in all instances where reports were obtained from cotton-manufacturing companies the results of our cost extensions were carefully examined by the officers of the mill before the report was forwarded to the Tariff Board. This examination was complete, and went into each detail of the extensions rather than merely to have the officers sign their names without making a close examination. The cost-extension figures were carefully compared with the cost extension made by the mills, and all the reports forwarded to the board were agreed by the officers of the company and representatives of the board to be correct. As to the accuracy of these extensions, I wish to state that the total expenditures of the company were carefully checked to agree with the figures published in their annual financial statement. Using these sums as a basis, we then made up our own cost statement according to our own methods, which we believe to be accurate and not merely the accepting of the company's own estimates of cost.
> In one instance a company was doing an $8,000,000 annual business; after the costs had been extended for this company and the total number of yards of each kind of goods multiplied by the cost per yard as shown by the report, the figures checked within $8.33 of the total amount of money expended by this company in manufacture during the year for which the costs were taken. In another case, by the same method, the variation amounted to $332. The greatest variation in any of the reports was in the case of a company doing a $2,000,000 annual business where, by multiplying the number of yards produced by the cost per yard ascertained by us, the difference amounted to $3,500. But this difference would not affect the costs in the sixth decimal place.
> In every case the companies agreed, after a careful examination, that our costs were correct, and in some few cases the mills have adopted our cost extensions in toto, while in others our system of extensions have been adopted at least in part.
> These facts I believe fully justify the statement that the most accurate costs possible have been obtained.
> Very truly, yours,
> HENRY C. EMERY, Chairman.

In view of that letter and the facts stated therein, any claim that the cost figures are not correct must necessarily be an impeachment not only of the experts who took them from the mill books, but of the books, the mill managers who reviewed and signed the statements, and indeed of everybody and everything except the one-year-old guesses of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is speaking of the cotton report?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HILL. I would be glad to, but I have not the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman read Mr. McRae's analysis of the wool report?

Mr. HILL. Yes. I can not yield now. I asked for an hour and a half with the expectation of answering questions, but I could not get it.

A COTTON SCHEDULE ONLY.

As the substitute is drawn it is a cotton schedule relating to articles composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, the words "or other vegetable fiber" being stricken out of it wherever found, thus sending articles composed in chief value of linen to the linen schedule, where they naturally belong, and bringing back to the cotton schedule sundry manufactures of cotton, which have nested for years in other schedules at higher rates of duty than the facts justified. The easiest possible way to change a tariff rate without seeming to do it is by a change of classification or by cutting out specific mention of the article and letting it fall innocently into a basket clause.

In my judgment a schedule of taxation should always be so plain that he who pays may read and know how much and for what the payment is made.

AD VALOREM DUTIES.

But it is said that the rates are ad valorem. That is true, and made so intentionally. If it is wrong, then every Republican who voted for the wool bill a few days ago is wrong, and every Republican who voted for the Payne or Dingley wool schedules is wrong, for every fabric-conversion duty in all of those schedules is an ad valorem duty and the only specifics are the direct and compensatory wool duties. In the cotton schedule there is no duty on the raw material, and hence no need for compensatory specifics.

On page 18 of the wool report, the board says:

It is probably impracticable to adopt a purely specific system of duties on woven fabrics. No feasible scheme of classifying and describing fabrics in terms corresponding to differences in conversion cost has yet been worked out.

On pages 65 to 75 of the cotton report, this question is exhaustively discussed and the consensus of the argument is overwhelming in favor of ad valorem rates as against the present law system.

On page 73 the board says:

So far as the motive for undervaluation is concerned, it is more powerful under the scheme adopted in the present law than it would be under a straight ad valorem tariff.

On page 74 they say:

A system which puts a specific rate on an ad valorem basis seems to combine the evils of both systems.

As further testimony on this point, I quote from an opinion given three years ago by a member of the New York Board of Appraisers. He says:

It is respectfully urged upon the committee that lines of demarcation dependent on value as in this case should be eliminated so far as possible from the tariff act. The fact that a few cents increase in the value of commodities raises the amount of the duty levied 125 to 150 per cent, as sometimes occurs in this paragraph, is a great incentive to fraud. In such cases the unscrupulous merchant enjoys an extraordinary advantage over the scrupulous one. The incentive to undervalue is so great and the difficulty of precise ascertainment of the actual market in these goods which constantly fluctuates, render satisfactory and just administration almost impossible.

This view was also confirmed by another member of the board of appraisers a few days ago when the substitute bill was submitted to him for suggestions both as to plan and rates, in a conference of several hours' duration.

Other eminent authorities might also be cited along the same line, but it would seem to be unnecessary.

CLASSIFICATION.

It is claimed also that the substitute bill changes the present system of classification. That is true and such a change is made absolutely necessary by the surprising statements of the Tariff Board concerning the weaving and finishing branches of the industry. Three years ago reputable men represented to the committee that an increase of duty of one-fortieth of a cent per number was needed on yarns and 1 cent per yard on all cloths, because of the excess cost of mercerizing here over the cost of like processes abroad. I have not the slightest doubt but that they honestly believed that this was true. As one of the committee, I accepted it as true then, and cheerfully voted for the additional duty. But it is now proven beyond dispute that in 1911, not only was there no excess in cost here, but that, taking all finishing costs of bleaching, dyeing, printing, and mercerizing on an average of all, the American cost was only about 80 per cent of that of our English competitors. The subject is discussed on pages 496 to 518, and the tabulated comparison of the respective charges in England and the United States will be found on page 502 of the report. Even if some slight variations should be found in the accuracy of a conclusion reached by taking an average cost, the differences would be fully met by the application of the regular ad valorem to the increased value of the cloths and yarns, because of the finishing processes.

It inevitably follows, therefore, that the classification by which cotton cloths receive cumulative duties under the present law should be changed, and the same thing is much more true of the Democratic bill, in which 5 per cent additional duty for finishing processes was provided last year and defended in the majority report. In the report of the Democratic majority this year, on page 25, they say (Rept. No. 829, 62d Cong., 2d sess.):

The conclusions, therefore, to be drawn from the board's study of the processes of finishing, including mercerizing and dyeing, is that no duty whatever is called for with respect to these processes in manufacture, and that such duty as may be imposed in that connection will be of service merely from the standpoint of revenue and might as well be discarded entirely, unless it be desired to impose a revenue duty upon goods which have been subjected to these particular processes.

In other words, they acknowledge the mistake in their classification guess of last year and now continue it under the pretense of a revenue duty, knowing full well that it is prohibitive and will not bring the revenue calculated in their last year's estimates. Would it not be far better for both sides of the House and the country if we should all manfully acknowledge that we were all mistaken in some of these things and make rates now based on the facts as the Tariff Board have given them to us?

AUTOMATIC LOOMS.

There is, however, another and far more important fact which absolutely controls the question of classification and wholly nullifies all former tariff legislation in this respect, and that is the automatic loom. I do not see how it could have been possible to have made classifications of plain woven cloths, based on fineness of yarns or number of threads to the inch, if the Congress had ever before had the knowledge which the Tariff Board has given to us with reference to this matter. It will be seen at once, by reference to pages 490 to 495 of the board report, that one of the determining factors of the difference in cost between Europe and the United States as to plain woven cotton goods is the use here of the automatic loom and the inability to use it in Europe. Take, for example, the bleached domestic No. 12 in the board's list of 100 samples, and it will be found that the number of looms tended by a single weaver on this fabric runs from 14 to 28, and that the product per hour of each weaver is from 64 to 101 yards, whereas the English weaver on the same fabric, operates 4 looms with a product of 18 yards per hour. Take the ordinary calico No. 41; the number of automatic looms tended by a single weaver in this country is 14 to 20, with a product per hour of 102 yards, whereas the English weaver tends 4 plain looms, with a product per hour of 24 yards. Take No. 76, an outing flannel; the weaver in the United States tends 12 to 20 looms, with an hourly product of from 60 to 80 yards, against the weaver of England, tending 4 plain looms, with an hourly product of 24 yards.

The summary of this statement shows that the production per weaver per hour on 29 of the 31 different kinds of cloths exemplified was very much greater in the United States than in England, reaching in some instances to five times as much, and the board states that the reason for this is the number of looms attended per weaver.

Now, when you add to this statement the fact that at the date of this report there were only between five and six thousand automatic looms in Lancashire out of a total of 741,000, and that in all Great Britain there were about 10,000 automatic looms, as against approximately 220,000 in the United States, it becomes manifest immediately that all classifications heretofore made on any other basis than that of loom production are completely nullified by this astounding fact, for the manufacture of plain woven cloth under these conditions is absolutely determined by the unit cost rather than by the wages paid to the individual.

The classification in this substitute bill, therefore, has been made first on the basis of plain woven goods in which the automatic loom is used in this country. Second, fancy woven goods produced on the plain looms with sundry mechanical attachments, where it is impossible for the weaver to attend to many of them, and hence where a much less production is secured than with automatics. As, for example, in No. 26, a checked lawn, where the report shows that on what is styled the dobby loom, the American weaver will tend from 8 to 12 machines and produce from 29 to 36 yards per hour, while the English weaver is not allowed to attend but 4 machines and produces but 14 yards per hour. This is one of a number of similar devices, but in all of them the number of looms attended and the product per hour is considerably in favor of the American weaver.

The third classification is the Jacquard loom, where the number of looms tended and the product in both countries is practically alike, and where because of this the marked difference in wages in the two countries necessitates a high protective duty.

The fourth classification is tapestries and pile fabrics, the production of which is also distinctly affected by the difference in the wage cost

On page 11, synopsis of the report, the board say:

Where automatic looms can be used a single weaver commonly tends 20 looms, and sometimes as many as 28. The result is that whereas the output per spinner per hour in England is probably as great or greater than in this country the output per weaver per hour is, upon a large class of plain goods, less, and in the case where automatic looms are used in this country and plain looms in England it is very much less.

It is manifest, therefore, that the determining factor in classifying fabrics is the style of weaving and not the fineness of the material used or the number of threads to the inch, and I do not see how it is possible for anyone who has read the report, even in the most casual way, to come to any other conclusion.

Indeed, the merest glance at the present law will justify the change.

Distinction between plain woven and other weaves, with a demarcation of weight per yard, is found in paragraph 357 of the linen schedule. In 323 of the cotton schedule fancy weaving is used as a reason for a cumulative duty of 1 and 2 cents per yard. In the silk schedule an arbitrary ad valorem limit of duty is fixed for fabrics made on Jacquard looms, and in paragraph 326 of the present cotton schedule, as in this substitute bill, all upholstered goods weighing over 6 ounces per yard woven on Jacquard looms carry a straight ad valorem duty.

If the rule of weight and style of weave is good for the present law, why is it not equally good for the substitute?

The cold facts in the case are that the distinction between plain and fancy weaves in part provided for in paragraph 323 by cumulative duties is duplicated in the classification by values in the countable paragraphs of the present law. A like duplication was stricken out in 1909 by an amendment in committee offered by the chairman, Mr. PAYNE. It was put back again in the Senate. I have no comments to make on it now. This classification again strikes out the duplication, and it ought never to go back again.

METHODS OF COMPARISON.

In the report on the wool schedule, comparisons between this and other countries were made on the basis of the difference in the cost of production, what the board terms the difference in conversion cost. In the cotton report a different method was generally used, although in yarns and to some extent in knit goods actual costs were secured. Speaking generally, however, the method used with regard to cotton cloths was, in the first place, to secure with an accuracy which, in my judgment, has never before been equaled in this country the actual American costs of production which, as I have shown by the letter of Chairman Emery, have been agreed to and certified after completion by the manufacturers themselves over their own signatures. They go into the most minute details, and are carried from the original material straight through to the finished articles in the hands of the ultimate consumer, so far as the 100 samples are concerned, out of a total of 1,268 standard cloths analyzed and reported upon by the board. The 100 samples so selected may be construed as fairly typical of the American production of cotton fabrics. They are followed through every process of manufacture, and photographic copies of the fabrics will be found in the report. For 91 of these samples the figures are complete, and I have them tabulated as follows:

1. List of 40 samples, where the American selling price is less than the English selling price without any duty.

2. List of 26 other samples, where the American cost plus the selling expense is less than the English selling price without any duty.

3. List of 17 other samples, where the American cost plus selling expense is less than the English selling price plus the duty proposed in the substitute bill.

4. List of eight samples, where the American cost plus selling expense is more than the English selling price plus the proposed duties in the substitute bill.

Averaging the costs of the American and foreign selling prices in each table I find the following: That on the goods named in class 1 they are reported to carry an average profit of 13.2 per cent, and that even then the American selling price is 20.3 per cent less in this country than the English selling price of like goods by the English mills in England. This class consists very largely of fabrics made upon the automatic loom. Is it not perfectly manifest that the selling price of the cloths in this class is not in any way affected by the existing tariff laws, but that domestic competition alone controls them, and that the American consumer pays no increased price whatever because of the tariff?

Class 2, a higher grade of fabrics, shows an average margin between the American cost plus selling expense and the American selling price of 36.2 per cent; but it also shows that the margin between the American cost plus selling expense and the English selling price without any duty is but 16.8 per cent, which indicates in a general way that these cloths are affected by the existing tariff law.

Class 3 shows that the margin between the American cost plus selling expense and the English selling price plus the proposed duty in the substitute bill is only 14.2 per cent, which, in a general way, indicates that it would be impossible for the American manufacturer to compete with his foreign competitor on the fabrics named in this list unless protected by duties as high as those prescribed in the substitute bill.

Class 4 is a list of exceptional cases, which, after much trouble and reinvestigation, were found in every case to furnish good and sufficient reasons why they might be considered exceptional, as, for example, where the articles compared here and abroad had differences in the texture and where in some cases the materials for the cloth manufacture had been taken from subsidiary concerns, and where one or more profits had been taken before the finished fabric was estimated upon. I am well aware that an average cost and an average selling price taken in this way only gives an indication of the general condition of an industry, and that here and there there may be an item which can not and ought not to be treated on the basis of a general average, and it has been a task of exceeding difficulty to adjust the rates in the substitute bill in such a way as to cover every case. On the face of the reports made by the Tariff Board and on the basis of the Chicago platform of 1908, no man can justify a duty of 5 per cent, which I have put on duck and unbleached sheetings, selling, as they are to-day, far below the prices which our competitors fix upon their products, but there are good and substantial reasons why every one of these products should bear a duty. In the first place, it is manifest by the report, as shown by the general summary of yarn costs, that it is not possible for the American manufacturer to make cotton yarns now as cheaply as his English competitor, and a small duty is needed in order to secure this market to our own producers. That we do have it practically now is shown by the fact that the importations are only about four tenths of 1 per cent of the domestic consumption and that exports are exceedingly small, amounting only to about $600,000 in 1911.

The difference in the conversion cost of yarn between the United States and England will be found on page 423 of the report. In figuring the rates of duty 10 per cent was added to the English cost to make the English export selling price, and the average found for yarns below No. 40 was 5.7 per cent. The American manufacturer was given the benefit of the doubt and the rate fixed at 7½ per cent.

The average for yarns from No. 50 to No. 70, inclusive, is shown to be 8½ per cent, and the rate fixed in the substitute bill is made 10 per cent.

Exceeding No. 80 the rate is fixed at 15 per cent.

These duties are in excess of the present difference in the cost of their production.

With this excess of duty fixed upon yarns it is only fair to the smaller manufacturers of this country, who buy their yarns and weave and finish only, that an equivalent or compensatory duty should be placed upon the cloth, and this alone would justify a small duty on the heavier and coarser products which are covered by the classification of not more than 5 square yards to the pound.

In the second place the selling prices on the goods named in all of these classes were taken in 1911, when the cotton industry was laboring under a marked depression, as is shown by the fact that the three calicoes named in class 1 were sold at about 10 per cent less than cost.

A third reason why a duty should be placed upon these products is the uncertainty of trade-union conditions both in this country and in England. Here no restriction is placed by the trade-unions on the number of automatic looms which a weaver may tend. In England the limit is four, but as American competition on many of these products becomes sharper and sharper in Canada, China, and other neutral territory, it is by no means impossible that these restrictions may be removed. That a material difference, however, will always exist in this respect can be inferred from the following quotation from page 494 of the Tariff Board report:

The automatic loom costs about two and one-half times the ordinary plain loom, and this has deterred many English mills already equipped with plain looms from adopting them. Again, English mills do not run such a large number of looms on a single-standard fabric as do American mills, and the automatic loom has not been found so suitable as plain looms for the varied Lancashire trade in dhoties and other fancies. Furthermore, the automatic loom requires stronger and better warp yarn than the plain loom, for the breakage of a single warp thread stops the loom. The American mills use strong ring-spun warp yarns, while a large portion of the English mills, producing mainly for the poorer classes of the Orient and other regions, have to size heavily to make goods cheap enough, and they ordinarily use a much lower grade of yarn than would American mills for fabrics that pass under the same trade name. The warp yarns used in the bulk of English cloths are mule spun, and since they are soft twisted to enable them to take up a larger amount of sizing and to give the required feel to the cloth, they are not so suited to the automatic loom as are the stronger American yarns.

A fourth reason why a duty should be placed upon them is that already, since these figures of costs and selling prices were taken, there has been a general advance in wages in the cotton industry throughout the United States of about 15 per cent, which of itself would be equivalent to an increase of cost of about 5 per cent on the finished fabric.

A fifth and last reason is Japanese competition. Personally I do not think it is serious at the present time because of the low grade of the product of the Japanese mills, due to their inexperience in the use of machinery and the inferior character of much of the material used. Japanese competition, however, as I know from personal observation, is a cloud on our western horizon which it is well worth our while to watch.

I desire now to call your attention to the rates in the Underwood bill, now pending before the House.

Since the substitute bill which I offered in the Ways and Means Committee was voted down and the Democratic bill was reported out favorably, the two great national parties have made new tariff declarations. Are these bills in accord with them? Let us go right to the foundation of the industry as shown by the difference in cost of production of yarns between England and the United States, found on page 423 of the Tariff Board report. I will insert a table showing the difference in cost on each of three warp yarns and five filling yarns there given and the duties under the present law, the Underwood, and substitute bills;

NOTE.—Duties figured on 10 per cent additional to English mill cost. Underwood duties average 36 per cent in excess of difference in cost. Substitute bill duties average 5 per cent in excess of difference in cost. Present law duties average 225 per cent in excess of difference in cost.

It appears that all show an average excess over and above the entire difference in cost in the present law by 225 per cent, in the substitute bill by 5 per cent, and in the Underwood so-called revenue bill by 36 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Right there, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield. I have not the time.

Now, I do not care whether these yarns are the staple product of the East or the West, the North or the South, but what I do claim is that the Underwood bill covers in its yarn duties the entire difference in cost of production, including conversion cost and raw material as well, on every one of these items by an excess of from 5 per cent to 97 per cent, and averaging 36 per cent, and that such duties are in no sense whatever for revenue only, but are positively prohibitory in their character and flatly in violation of the Democratic platform, and if this policy is to prevail in regard to one part of the cotton industry it should be carried straight through the bill and take in knit goods, and reach out to all of the other schedules of the tariff law.

If the tariff is to be reformed, let it be done on national and not on sectional lines. For one, I am not yet ready to make tariff rates for the avowed purpose of transferring industries from one part of the country to another, as indicated by one gentleman in the debate on this bill last summer, when he said, "We in the South intend to make New England mill owners come and put their mills in the South or else go out of business."

If we have sinned heretofore in ignorance, that is no excuse for sinning now against the light and knowledge which the Tariff Board has given us concerning the cotton and woolen schedules, and if we are to have an excess of 36 per cent over and above the difference in cost on low numbers of cotton yarns and far more than that on plain woven cotton fabrics, I want to see like rates of duty written into the farmers free-list bill, the metal, chemical, and woolen schedules, and it does not make the slightest difference to me whether it is done under the name of a revenue, a protective, or a prohibitory tariff.

When Schedule K was under consideration we heard much from our Democratic friends of the claim that the ad valorem equivalents of duties found therein were in some cases higher on the fabrics used by the majority of the people than on those which were ordinarily purchased by the rich or well-to-do. Whatever there is to that claim is due to the specific duty placed upon the raw material.

In the cotton schedule there is no duty on the raw material, and I desire now to reverse the situation and show to our Democratic friends precisely what they have done with reference to white goods and calicoes, which are the fabrics from which very much of the clothing of the great mass of the people of this country is made.

Sample No. 41, an American-made calico, sold in 1911 at wholesale at 4.11 cents per yard, as against an English selling price of 5.09 cents, or 23.8 per cent less than the Englishman was selling it for. That fabric carries in the substitute bill a duty of 10 per cent, but in the Underwood bill a duty of 20 per cent.

If the tariff is a tax added in all cases as they claimed in the discussion on the wool schedule during the extra session, do our Democratic friends intend by continuing their duty of 20 per cent, which was proposed last summer, to increase the cost of clothing to the poor people of this country beyond the point indicated by the report of the Tariff Board as fair and reasonable? Why will they not frankly acknowledge their mistake and at least accept the provisions of the substitute bill?

Take sample No. 5 of unbleached sheeting. In 1911 this article was sold by the American mills at 7 cents a yard, and at that price showed a profit of 7.3 per cent. The like article in England sold at 8.14 cents per yard, 16 per cent higher than it did in this country. The Underwood bill bears a duty of 15 per cent on this fabric; the substitute bill a duty of 5 per cent.

Why do our Democratic friends insist on continuing their mistake of the last session and thus, if their theories are correct, adding to the cost of the articles made from this fabric for the use of our own people? Fifteen per cent is a prohibitive duty. What is the reason that they insist upon it? It will bring no revenue.

Take sample No. 1 of unbleached duck. The Underwood rate is 15 per cent; the rate in the substitute bill is 5 per cent. The American selling price last year was 12.97 cents per yard; the English selling price of the same article was 17.1 cents per yard. They will get no revenue from it, or none that will amount to anything, for the whole business of manufacturing duck is practically controlled by a trust, and the entire revenue received in 1910 was only $33,195 on this whole line of fabrics.

But why go into further details in regard to these cases? The figures in the report show for themselves, and nowhere more strikingly than in the statement of imports and exports of these plain woven fabrics for the year 1911. Last year we imported 4,180,906 yards of unbleached cotton goods and exported 165,418,000 yards. We imported of bleached cotton goods 14,266,228 yards and exported 27,419,000 yards. We imported of colored goods, and so forth, 37,141,426 yards and exported 153,753,000 yards, a total importation of 55,516,561 yards and a total exportation of 346,590,000 yards.

Imports from United States into Canada.

Bleached	764,912
Colored	1,225,527
Total	3,090,439

Under these circumstances is it not trifling with well-established facts—facts fully admitted in the report of the Democratic majority on this bill—when that majority claim that the excessive duties which they have thus fixed on these plain woven fabrics are for revenue purposes, knowing as they do that these fabrics are practically noncompetitive in this market, and that whether the rates are raised or lowered will in no way affect the importations, and that their estimates of increased revenue are thus wholly invalidated and made of no account?

A year ago, without the facts now shown by the Tariff Board before them, the Democratic Party offered their cotton bill, and claimed that more than $200,000,000 was annually added to the cost of domestic cotton manufactures by reason of the tariff, and that by their reduction of rates and increased importations to the amount of $11,000,000 worth because of it they would save $88,000,000 to the people annually and only lose about two millions of net revenue.

Now, the total production of cotton cloth in 1910 was $428,203,850. As we imported only 1.79 per cent of that amount and exported 3.18 per cent, the consumption of the American people for 1910 must have been the total production less the surplus exports, making an actual consumption of $422,251,817. If the respective importations of plain woven and figured cloths given by tariff bulletin No. 5 from Charlotte, N. C., are a fair indication of consumption, more than 50 per cent of our cloth production is plain woven.

As is now shown by the Tariff Board, the American average selling price of these cloths is 20 per cent below the average selling price of our nearest competitor, and this is practically admitted in the report of the Democratic majority. If that is so, and I believe it is, instead of a hypothetical increase in cost of $200,000,000 on the domestic product because of the present tariff, there is a real, demonstrable, actual saving of more than $60,000,000 annually to our people as the direct result of the domestic competition which has come as the natural result of the development of this great industry under the Republican system of protection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, if this country could have a guaranty that this tremendous saving under the protective system would not be imperiled by the combination and consolidation of the industry and the elimination of home competition, there would not be the slightest necessity for the reduction of rates to the basis of the facts as found by the Tariff Board, but these combinations and consolidations have already begun, in the Northern and Southern States alike, if the reports in the daily press are correct. It is true that the industry is widely scattered and the raw material for it difficult to be controlled, but it is no more so than the meat and tobacco, the sugar and steel, and combinations in these trades have been successfully made. In no one of them has the killing of domestic competition and the control of the price of the raw material and finished product offered so great a return as the cotton industry would give. In the face of the facts shown by the Tariff Board the political party, either Republican or Democratic, which ignores the situation and permits the possibility of a monopolizing of this great industry by the retention of excessive and unnecessary duties and a consequent increase of the cost of cheap clothing for the masses of our people, will receive and deserve the censure of the people, whether it is done under the specious plea of a tariff for revenue only by the Democratic Party, or by nonaction by the Republican Party. Neither party can complete legislation now, but neither party can shake off the responsibility of impeachment of the facts or else adjusting legislation to them.

The trouble with the Democratic cotton bill is that it is like a last-year's bird's nest, which was a misfit when it was made and is a misfit now, besides being badly battered by a hard winter's storm of facts.

The bill is wrong at both ends—high enough at the beginning to breed combinations and low enough at the end to destroy the knit-goods industry and drive it out of this country, which would be an abject surrender to Germany.

On plushes and velvets, bought and used by the well to do, the Underwood bill puts the same duty as on the plain woven Sunday dress cloth of the working girl.

On full-fashioned hosiery the Underwood rate is 45 per cent.

If Members will turn to page 615 of the board report, they will find comparisons with the corresponding German product, showing an average difference of 58 per cent, and the only excuse I have to offer for the low rates of 55 and 60 per cent in the substitute bill is the reduction in the duties on the yarns from which they are made. On knit underwear the Underwood rate is a straight 30 per cent. In the substitute bill a graded rate of 20, 30, 40, and 45 per cent.

On men's and boys' gloves the Underwood rate is 35 per cent, and in the substitute bill 50 per cent.

Now, there is not the slightest doubt but that with reference to all of these knit goods the Underwood bill can properly be called a bill for revenue only, for it will insure a large revenue immediately and a constantly increasing one year by year as the industry gradually dies out in this country.

But why go further into the details of this guesswork Democratic cotton schedule called a tariff for revenue only?

The sum and substance of it is: High duties and no revenue from the cloth fabrics used by the poor; on the knit fabrics used by the rich, low duties, large revenue, and a young and growing industry strangled.

Indeed, thus far in this Congress the whole Democratic tariff legislation has been a hideous, economic farce. The free-list bill of the extra session was a flat violation of every theory which the party ever held and a repudiation of every promise made to the American people. It did not give one cent of revenue to the Treasury, but it stripped every particle of protection from nearly $3,000,000,000 worth of American products. That was a sectional tariff for politics only, and for all time to come will hold a unique place in American history as a monumental specimen of class legislation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The extra-session attempts to revise the metal and chemical schedules were stabs in the dark at the system of protection and amazing mistakes which have since been repudiated by their authors with as cheerful unanimity as that with which they approved them six months before.

The Democratic revision of the chemical schedule for revenue only at this session and this substitute Republican revision of the cotton schedule based on the report of the Tariff Board demonstrate the irreconcilable conflict between a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection.

Under the application of the latter policy all noncompetitive raw materials must be admitted free of duty, and as our industries develop and domestic costs are lessened it follows that the free list of finished products can be gradually enlarged, tariffs materially reduced, and at the same time the American wage scale and standard of living maintained, or what in my judgment is better yet, duties reduced in part and a higher wage scale and better standard of living made possible for the men and women employed in industrial pursuits.

No better illustration of this could be found than is afforded by the progress of the cotton industry.

On the other hand, with $48,000,000 worth of raw materials for the chemical industry taken from the free list of the Payne bill and increased in cost by a Democratic revenue duty, and with reduced duties on the finished product at the same time, there is no possible place from which the reduction can come except from the wages of labor.

It is not a question of the amount of taxation, for in the aggregate that must be the same in either case, for the expenses of Government must be met.

It is simply and solely whether in applying those taxes it shall be done in such a way as to encourage and develop our own industries or the industries of Europe.

It is whether we shall make life better—and better, worth living here—or sacrifice our own people to the uplifting of the people in other lands.

It is a question of a plenty of work and good wages or no work or low wages.

The two policies are before you. "Choose you this day which you will serve." [Applause on the Republican side.]

The following is submitted as an appendix:

A REPUBLICAN PROTECTIVE SCHEDULE I BASED ON THE REPORT OF THE TARIFF BOARD, RELATING TO PRODUCTS COMPOSED WHOLLY OR IN CHIEF VALUE OF COTTON.

A bill (H. R. ——) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the paragraphs of Schedule I of section 1 of said act from 313 to 332, inclusive of both, and inserting in place thereof the following:

1. Cotton card laps, sliver, roving, or roping, 5 per cent ad valorem.

2. Cotton waste and flocks manufactured, 10 per cent ad valorem; antiseptic, medicated, or sterilized cotton, cotton waste, or flocks, 20 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 20 per cent; Underwood, 5 per cent.)

3. Cotton yarns in the grey, or otherwise, not advanced beyond the condition of singles, by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together, not exceeding No. 40, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

Exceeding No. 40 and not exceeding No. 80, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Exceeding No. 80, 15 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, up to No. 15, 12.7 per cent; Nos. 16 to 30, 15.37 per cent; Nos. 31 to 40, 22.12 per cent; Nos. 41 to 80, 23.3 per cent; Nos. 100 to 120, 27.12 per cent; remainder, 15 per cent; total grey single for 1911, 16.39 per cent; colored, etc., total, 30 per cent. Underwood, up to No. 50, 10 per cent; Nos. 51 to 100, 15 per cent; above No. 100, 20 per cent.)

4. Cotton yarn or thread not otherwise provided for, in the grey or otherwise, advanced beyond the condition of singles by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together, and cable laid yarns or threads, in the grey or otherwise, made by grouping or twisting two or more twisted yarns or threads together, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as the single yarns from which they are made, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, total cable laid, etc., 30.52 per cent; colored, 20.54 per cent; single, mercerized, 23 per cent; total, all yarns, 30.5 per cent. Underwood, yarns advanced same rate as singles.)

Spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons on spools, shall be dutiable at the same rates of duty as the single yarns from which they are made.

(NOTE.—Present law, thread average of all, 24 per cent. Underwood, 15 per cent.

Differences in yarn conversion costs between United States and England (p. 423): Yarns No. 30 filling, 3.4 per cent; No. 40, 4.5 per cent; yarns No. 30 warp, 6.8 per cent; No. 40, 8 per cent; average, 5.7 per cent. Yarns No. 50 filling, 6.6 per cent; No. 60, 7.5 per cent; No. 70, 8.9 per cent; yarns No. 50 warp, 10 per cent; average, 8.5 per cent.

Ten per cent added to English cost to make selling price on which to figure duty. No yarns made for sale in this country above No. 140. Total imports of yarns to production, four-tenths of 1 per cent. Total imports of thread, 2½ per cent of home production.

One company controls thread trade in Great Britain, United States, Canada, Russia, Austria, Germany, France, and Spain and fills orders from local factories.)

5. Cotton cloth, plain woven, in the gray, or bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, mercerized, or otherwise finished, containing not more than 5 square yards to the pound, 5 per cent ad valorem.

Containing more than 5 and not more than 7½ square yards to the pound, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Containing more than 7½ square yards to the pound, 15 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, average of all cotton cloth containing only ordinary warp and filling threads either in the gray or bleached, or dyed, etc., 39.54 per cent. Underwood, made from No. 50 yarn or less, 15 per cent; Nos. 50 to 100, inclusive, 20 per cent; above No. 100, 25 per cent; if bleached, dyed, etc., No. 50 yarn or less, 20 per cent; Nos. 50 to 100, inclusive, 25 per cent; above No. 100, 30 per cent.

These cloths principally woven on automatic looms, see pages 490 to 495 of report. Costs of cloth from low-cost mills. Industry depressed in 1911. Trade-union rules as to looms run may be changed in either country. For finishing costs see page 502. The duties named herein should cover all contingencies. Wages have been advanced since Tariff Board figures were taken.)

6. Cotton cloth, fancy woven, in the gray, or bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, mercerized, or otherwise finished, containing figures produced by various weaving devices known as dobby, dropbox, leno, lappet, swivel, or any other name except Jacquard, 20 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law. Average of fancy cotton cloth containing other than ordinary warp and filling threads, gray, bleached, dyed, etc., 49.13 per cent; Underwood, by number of threads.)

7. Cotton cloth woven by means of the Jacquard attachment, not otherwise provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Cotton table damask, 25 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of cotton table damask, or of which cotton table damask is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 25 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law. Cotton damask, 40 per cent; Underwood, by number of threads.)

8. Cloths containing silk or artificial silk, in which cotton is the component material of chief value, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as cotton cloths of similar weave, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law 1911, 50 to 58 per cent; Underwood, 30 per cent.)

Clause 8. If silk exceeds 10 per cent in quantity, it will be of chief value and go into silk schedule.)

9. Cotton cloths filled or coated, in whole or in part, including oilcloth of cotton, waterproof cloths composed of cotton or in which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law 1911, 42 to 50 per cent; Underwood, filled or coated, 25 per cent; waterproof, 25 per cent.)

10. Handkerchiefs or mufflers of cotton, in the piece or otherwise, finished or unfinished, hemstitched or not, not otherwise specially provided for, shall pay the same rate of duty as the cloth of which they are made, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law average, 55.11 per cent; Underwood, all, 30 per cent.)

11. Plushes, velvets, velveteens, corduroys, and all pile fabrics made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, whether the pile covers the entire surface or not:

Uncut, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Cut, in whole or in part, 40 per cent ad valorem.

Provided, That manufactures or articles in any form, including such as are commonly known as bias dress facings or skirt bindings, made or cut from plushes, velvets, or other pile fabrics composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as the fabrics from which they are made.

(NOTE.—Present law average, 52.85 per cent; Underwood, all, 30 per cent.)

12. Curtains, table covers, and all articles manufactured of cotton chenille, or of which cotton chenille is the component material of chief value; cotton reps, Jacquard figured tapestry and Jacquard figured upholstery goods, weighing over 6 ounces per square yard, made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 40 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 50 per cent; Underwood, no distinction in weight, 35 per cent.)

13. Stockings, hose, and half hose, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames, commercially known as seamless, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 30 per cent; Underwood, 20 per cent.)

14. Stockings, hose, or half hose, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames or knit by hand and commercially known as full-fashioned, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, valued at not more than $2 per dozen pairs, 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $2 per dozen pairs, 60 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 55 to 92 per cent; Underwood, 45 per cent.)

15. Shirts and drawers, pants, vests, union suits, combination suits, tights, sweaters, corset covers, and all underwear of every description, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames or knit by hand, finished or unfinished, not otherwise provided for, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, valued at not more than $1.50 per dozen garments, 20 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per dozen garments and not more than $3 per dozen garments, 30 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $3 per dozen garments and not more than $6 per dozen garments, 40 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $6 per dozen garments, 45 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 63 to 50 per cent; Underwood, 30 per cent.)

16. Men's and boys' gloves, knitted or woven, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 50 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 86 to 50 per cent; Underwood, 35 per cent.)

17. Tire fabric or fabric suitable for use in pneumatic tires, made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 25 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 45 per cent; Underwood, 25 per cent.)

18. Bone casings, garters, suspenders and braces, webs, webbings, and tubing, any of the foregoing composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, or of cotton and india rubber, and not embroidered by hand or machinery; spindle banding, woven, braided or twisted lamp, stove, or candle wicking; loom harness, healds or collets; boot, shoe, and corset lacings; labels for garments or other articles, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Belting for machinery made of cotton and india rubber, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

19. Clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, wholly or partly manufactured, not specially provided for, composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, 30 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 50 per cent; Underwood, 30 per cent; collars and cuffs, 25 per cent.)

20. All articles made from cotton cloth, and all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for, 30 per cent ad valorem.

(NOTE.—Present law, 45 per cent; Underwood, 30 per cent.)

21. The term cotton cloth wherever used in the paragraphs of this schedule, unless otherwise specially provided, shall be held to include all woven fabrics composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, in the piece or cut in lengths, and shall not include any article finished, or unfinished, made from cotton cloth.

SEC. 2. That the last clause of paragraph 347 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"Waterproof cloth composed of vegetable fiber other than cotton, whether composed in part of india rubber or otherwise, 10 cents per square yard and 20 per cent ad valorem."

SEC. 3. That paragraph 347 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended by adding the following proviso: "Provided, That none of the foregoing shall apply to coated or filled cotton cloth, or articles made therefrom."

SEC. 4. That paragraph 348 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "Shirt collars and cuffs, composed of linen, or of which linen is the component material of chief value, 40 cents per dozen pieces and 20 per cent ad valorem."

SEC. 5. That paragraph 349 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended by striking out therefrom the words "webs and webbings."

(NOTE.—Total production of the industry for 1910, $628,391,813; total production of cloth only, $428,203,850; per cent of imports to total production, 1.79; per cent of exports to total production, 3.18; per cent of cloth imports to cloth production, 2.62; per cent of cloth exports to cloth production, 4.66 (see p. 177).)

THE TARIFF BOARD,
Treasury Building, Washington, May 25, 1912.

HON. EBENEZER J. HILL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HILL: Referring to your questions in conversation with Mr. Cowgill regarding the accuracy of the cost figures in our cotton report and your request that a statement be made in writing, I beg to say that in all instances where reports were obtained from cotton-manufacturing companies the results of our cost extensions were carefully examined by the officers of the mill before the report was forwarded to the Tariff Board. This examination was complete, and went into each detail of the extensions rather than merely to have the officers sign their names without making a close examination. The cost extension figures were carefully compared with the cost extension made by the mills, and all the reports forwarded to the board were agreed by the officers of the company and representatives of the board to be correct. As to the accuracy of these extensions, I wish to state that the total expenditures of the company were carefully checked to agree with the figures published in their annual financial statement. Using these sums as a basis, we then made up our own cost statement according to our own methods, which we believe to be accurate and not merely the accepting of the company's own estimates of cost.

In one instance a company was doing an $8,000,000 annual business; after the costs had been extended for this company and the total number of yards of each kind of goods multiplied by the cost per yard, as shown by the report, the figures checked within $8.33 of the total amount of money expended by this company in manufacture during the year for which the costs were taken. In another case, by the same method, the variation amounted to $332. The greatest variation in any of the reports was in the case of a company doing a $2,000,000 annual business where, by multiplying the number of yards produced by the cost per yard ascertained by us, the difference amounted to $3,500. But this difference would not affect the costs in the sixth decimal place.

In every case the companies agreed, after a careful examination, that our costs were correct, and in some few cases the mills have adopted our cost extensions in toto, while in others our system of extensions have been adopted at least in part.

These facts I believe fully justify the statement that the most accurate costs possible have been obtained.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY C. EMERY, Chairman.

Sample No. 54: Cotton serge is a printed stripe compared with a single dyed yarn stripe.

Sample No. 56: Printed dimity, slight variation in organization of cost.

Sample No. 63: Chambray, American cost obtained in exceptionally high-cost mill, that purchased its yarn in limited quantities.

Sample No. 87: Tissue, considerable variation in the organization of the cloths compared.

Sample No. 93: Cotton tapestry, a high American cost for cards and designs. This cloth was sold in limited quantities with a high selling expense (18 cents per yard).

Sample No. 95: Novelty gingham, American cost estimated.

Sample No. 97: Silk gingham, American cost obtained in high-cost mill, manufacturing a limited quantity of cloth of this construction.

NOTE.—Without regard to differences in selling prices, the differences in costs of conversion are believed to be fully covered by the duties named herein.

CHARACTER OF FUTURE TARIFF LEGISLATION.

The keynote of the declaration of the Republican Party with reference to future tariff legislation is found in the following extract from the Chicago platform, adopted on June 22, 1912:

"We hold that the import duties should be high enough, while yielding a sufficient revenue, to protect adequately American industries and wages. Some of the existing import duties are too high and should be reduced. Readjustment should be made from time to time to conform to changing conditions and to reduce excessive rates, but without injury to any American industry. To accomplish this correct information is indispensable. This information can best be obtained by an expert commission, as the large volume of useful facts contained in the recent reports of the Tariff Board has demonstrated.

"The pronounced feature of modern industrial life is its enormous diversification. To apply tariff rates justly to these changing conditions requires closer study and more scientific methods than ever before. The Republican Party has shown by its creation of a Tariff Board its recognition of this situation and its determination to be equal to it."

In order that one may see whether the rates provided in the foregoing bill are in accordance with the declarations of the platform a table is herewith submitted, showing the percentage which can be added to the American cost of the following fabrics, plus selling expenses, in order to equal the selling price of the competing English fabric in New York, with landing charges and the duties paid under this proposed bill. It must be understood that the English competing price includes a profit, but that the profit for the American manufacturer, together with all the contingencies of the business, such as "dumping," future advances in wages, trade-union restrictions, etc., must come from the percentage of margin shown herein.

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to use some of his time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I am advised at present, there will be only one closing speech. I may have other requests for time, but I am not prepared to use any of our time now.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, of the many iniquitous things contained in the Payne-Aldrich law the cotton and woolen schedules are the worst. President Taft, while pronouncing the bill as a whole the best tariff law ever enacted, declared that the woolen schedule was indefensible I think even the President will admit now that the cotton schedule was also indefensible. These two schedules especially were condemned by Progressive Republicans the country over. They were condemned by voters of all parties at the election in 1910 and are largely responsible for the Democratic majority in this House to-day.

Vindication of a position taken is always a pleasant thing, but it is peculiarly so when that vindication comes from a tariff board selected by the same President who condemned Progressive Republicans for taking the position they did.

We contended that the increases in the rates in the cotton schedule were unwarranted from any standpoint and were far beyond any difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. The Tariff Board has so found.

And, Mr. Speaker, let me say just a word with reference to the position of the Democratic majority upon this Tariff Board. I say without any hesitation that, although there are things that may be criticized, so far as the report not being complete is concerned, there is more real information with reference to this subject in that report of the Tariff Board than has been gathered from the beginning of tariff agitation to the present day from any other source. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I say further, without any hesitation, if it had not been for the fact that that Tariff Board is a product of the Republican Party, that if the members of that board had not been appointed by a Republican President, instead of condemning that report you upon the other side would be quoting from it in your campaign textbook this fall. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The board finds that the difference in cost of production of cotton yarns in the United States and England is from 3.8 per cent to 11.9 per cent ad valorem, while the rates in the Payne-Aldrich law range from 15 to 48 per cent ad valorem. The board finds that the duties are in some cases four and five times greater than the difference in cost of production.

In the case of cotton cloth the rates are even more unjustifiable. We have heard much about the lower wages paid abroad, and it has been assumed by some that the duties should at least equal the difference in wages, thus assuming that there is no difference in efficiency. We have often heard upon this floor the statement made that wages in the Orient are 10 and 15 cents per day, and for that reason alone it was assumed that high tariffs were needed for protection.

The Tariff Board has so completely exploded that bugaboo that I do not think it will be heard of again in this Chamber. But for fear that some gentleman may ignorantly fall into the same error, I wish to spend a moment upon it now. In the debate at the special session upon the cotton schedule the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], speaking of the cotton mills of Japan, said:

> Their mills are the best equipped made in the English workshops, and their labor the cheapest on the face of this earth—10 cents for boys and girls, 15 cents for women, and 22 cents for men per day.

A moment later he said:

> If this bill should become a law, there is not a cotton mill in a single Southern State that will ever sell a yard of calico on the Pacific coast or in the far Western States in competition with calico made in the mills of Japan.

Now, I do not quote this language for the purpose of criticizing the gentleman from Tennessee, but only to illustrate how lack of information leads to recklessness of statement. In refutation of the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee I ask you to turn to Table 162 of the report of the Tariff Board, which gives a comparison of the employees necessary to operate a 1,000-loom weaving mill in the United States and in Japan. The wages of the weavers in the Japanese mills are, it is true, only 18½ cents per day as against $1.59 per day in the American mill, but it requires 700 weavers to do the work in a Japanese mill as against only 53 in an American mill, and the total cost per day for weaving in the Japanese mill is $129.50 as against only $84.27 in the American mill. Putting it in another way, one American weaver for $1.59 does as much work as 13 Japanese weavers for $2.40.

Believing that ghost will not walk again, let us get back to a consideration of the difference in cost of production in this country and England. We find that an American weaver, as a rule, produces a great deal more than his English brother. Quoting from the report of the Tariff Board, on page 11:

> In the case of plain looms (not automatic) the English weaver seldom tends more than 4 looms, while in this country a weaver rarely tends less than 6, and more frequently 8 or even 12, if equipped with "warp stop motions."

The report then goes on to say that automatic looms are little used in England, while there are over 200,000 in the United States, and on such looms the American weaver commonly tends 20 and sometimes as high as 28.

After going into a full recital of the facts, the board, on page 12 of the report, sums up the matter as follows:

> Keeping the above facts in mind, it may be stated that in the case of a large variety of plain goods the labor cost of turning yarn into cloth in the United States is not greater, and in some cases is lower, than in England.

The report then goes on to state that in finer goods the cost is greater in this country, and we then find the following:

> Figures are presented in the report showing that although labor costs in the cotton industry are in many cases lower in the United States than England, yet the actual hourly earnings in this country are, in most of the principal occupations, much greater.

This corroborates the assertion made by most economists that higher wages may often lower labor costs.

In the Payne-Aldrich law higher rates of duty are imposed upon cloth which is bleached, printed, dyed, mercerized, and so forth. Concerning this the board finds, on page 13:

> A comparison of 60 specific samples for which finishing data were obtained shows that in most cases the difference between the charges in the two countries were slight, but that the American charges were slightly lower on most of the samples.

Another interesting comparison is furnished by Table 136, where 100 samples of cloth are taken, ranging from calico print to cotton tapestry, and a comparison is made between the American cost of production, both including and excluding selling expense and the English selling price, which of course includes a profit to the English manufacturer.

On 40 of the 100 samples the English price is 42.3 per cent greater than the American cost, excluding selling expense. It is 33.5 per cent greater, including selling expense.

On these 40 samples it is clear that there should be no duty at all, either from the Republican or Democratic standpoints, for any duty is practically prohibitive. From a Republican standpoint no duty is needed to protect the American manufacturer. From a Democratic standpoint no duty should be imposed, for it will produce no revenue, and from their standpoint is nothing but a tax upon the American people, a "robbery," as they put it, enriching the tariff barons alone. That is what they did in their bill at the special session and what they have done in this bill when on these 40 samples they placed duties ranging from 15 to 30 per cent ad valorem.

Again returning to the 100 samples compared by the Tariff Board, in addition to the 40 I have already spoken of, there are 26 samples where the American cost both including and excluding selling expense is less than the English price, but the margin of difference is not so great as in the case of the 40 samples. Of these 26 samples the English selling price is 25 per cent greater than the American cost, excluding selling expense. It is 16.8 per cent greater, including selling expense. It is clear that this margin is amply sufficient to enable the American manufacturer to successfully compete with the English price, but remembering that the English price includes a profit, and we do not know exactly what English cost is, a small duty would be justified both from the standpoint of protection and revenue.

So far, then, out of 100 samples of cotton cloth we have 66 of them where the average English price is from 16.8 per cent to 33.5 per cent greater than the average American cost of production, including selling expense.

There are 25 samples where the average English price is less than the American cost of production. On 17 of the samples the English price is 2 per cent greater than the American cost, excluding selling expense, but including selling expense the American cost is 10.4 per cent greater than the English selling price.

On 8 samples the American cost, both including and excluding selling expense, is greater than the English price. It is 31.5 per cent greater excluding and 51.1 per cent greater including selling expense. On these 25 samples therefore a substantial duty is justified both from a protective and a revenue standpoint.

I have not the time to analyze the entire report of the Tariff Board and shall confine myself to this statement regarding cotton yarn and cotton cloth. I will, however, frankly state that upon the balance of the schedule the report of the board is not so complete as it should be, and as I am satisfied it would have been could the board have had further time to complete their investigation. However, we have sufficient information to deal intelligently with every paragraph of the schedule.

We have before us the Democratic bill, which is the same bill that was passed at the special session. I propose in the time I have left to discuss that bill and make some comparisons between it and the report of the Tariff Board.

When the bill was under consideration at the special session I voted for it and spoke for it. I undertook to show then that notwithstanding its label, and notwithstanding the declaration of its sponsors, it was in the main a protective measure.

The report of the Tariff Board now conclusively shows that this Democratic bill was and is a protective measure but that many of the rates in it are higher than can possibly be indorsed by any Republican who stands upon the Chicago platform of 1908. After a careful examination of the report of the board I was satisfied that if our Democratic friends brought in a bill at this session revising the cotton schedule that the rates in it would, upon such a staple necessity as cotton cloth, be much lower than those in the bill passed last year, but to my utter amazement we find that notwithstanding the information they now have, they offer the same bill as they did at the special session, and we have to-day a situation unparalleled in American history of the Democratic Party offering a tariff bill that carries prohibitive duties upon necessaries of life which are much higher than the Republican Party can indorse. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Never again can the Democratic Party boast that it stands for a tariff for revenue only. Never again can it, without the rankest hypocrisy, go before the American people and denounce the robber tariff barons and condemn the Republican Party for taxing the people for the benefit of the cotton manufacturer. What explanation there may be for this strange attitude of the Democratic Party I will not undertake to say. The fact that there are very large cotton mills in the South may be one reason, but I am more inclined to think that it is merely another evidence of the stubbornness of the Democracy, and this exhibition makes the emblem of the Democratic Party more appropriate than ever.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. CANNON. I understand from reports in the newspapers and otherwise that Marshall Field & Co. have bought a large number of these mills that make the kind of cotton cloth to which the gentleman refers, and we all understand that Marshall Field & Co. would not object to a prohibitive duty. Although they are the great distributing merchants in our Middle West, they have sense enough to keep quiet when their friends are around.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. I am only stating what I understand from the reports.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand the gentleman. But after all, and to be entirely fair to the Democratic majority, they are only pursuing their ordinary course of seldom being willing to progress and never able to learn. They are always looking backward, never forward, so far as constructive statesmanship is concerned. To paraphrase and adapt a statement of the candidate of the Democratic Party for President, Woodrow Wilson: "The Democratic majority in this House occupies a place in the ship of state—in the stern, looking back at the wake of the ship." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

But it is not for me to attempt to explain the utterly indefensible position of the Democratic majority with respect to this bill. We know that it has information now from a Tariff Board appointed by a Republican President, a Tariff Board the reports of which the Democrats said less than a year ago would be unreliable because they would unduly favor the protected interests of the country.

They know that that charge has fallen to the ground. They know that the report of the Tariff Board will not sustain many of the rates in this bill. They know that many of the rates in this bill should be lower, according to the report of the board.

The Democratic majority are not brave enough nor patriotic enough to frankly confess that they were mistaken as to the nonpartisan character of the Tariff Board. They are not brave enough nor patriotic enough to frankly take advantage of the report of the board in the interest of the American people. They evidently take the position that they would rather be consistent than right, and they are very seldom either. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I am confirmed in this by an article in the Washington Post of yesterday morning. I intended to have it with me, but it is an interview with the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], who had just come from a conference with Gov. Wilson, the Democratic candidate. You remember at that interview he stated that the policy of the Democratic Party would be a gradual reduction of the tariff, and that they would not attempt to come at one time down to a revenue tariff only, and he gave a specific illustration; that if the reduction of 30 points was necessary to bring the tariff down to a revenue basis, they would favor first bringing it down 15 points, or halfway. Now, they might make that kind of contention were it not for the fact that only the day before yesterday that very proposition was presented to this House, the very proposition that Mr. REDFIELD contends for, in the woolen bill that came from the Senate, and the Democratic majority, then voiced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] took the position that they were not in favor of going halfway; they were all in favor of making no reduction unless they could cut to the very bottom, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the position the Democratic majority would like to take is that to avoid any revision now, for the benefit of the protective manufacturers, they say, "We will not have any tariff revision now; we will let you alone." They say, "When we get into power do not worry, because then we will vote for such reductions as we are voting against now."

But I now desire to submit some proof that many of the rates in this Democratic bill are too high, are prohibitive, and will produce no revenue.

The first paragraph relates to cotton yarn and imposes duties according to numbers from 10 per cent to 20 per cent ad valorem. The Tariff Board finds that the difference in cost of production of yarns, except those of the highest numbers, ranges from 3.8 per cent to 11.9 per cent ad valorem, while the lowest rate in this Democratic bill is 10 per cent ad valorem.

Paragraph 3 relates to cotton cloth on which duties are imposed ranging from 15 per cent ad valorem, and in addition 5 per cent is added if the cloth is bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, or mercerized.

The report of the board conclusively shows that these rates can not be sustained from a revenue standpoint, and they are too high from a protective standpoint. Cotton cloth enters into the cost of living of every American home, and if the Democratic majority was at all sincere in its profession of concern for the American people they would have reduced the rates in this paragraph of the bill. The report of the board shows conclusively that the coarser and heavier fabrics are produced cheaper here than abroad, and that a duty of 15 per cent, as proposed in this bill, can not possibly be a revenue producer. It is just as prohibitive, as far as importations are concerned, as is the present law.

I am aware that the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and others upon the Democratic side attempt to meet this criticism by declaring that the rates proposed in the present bill are a great reduction from those contained in the Payne-Aldrich law; that they do not claim that the rates could not be made much lower without injury to the American industry; that they are making gradual reductions and do not propose to go the whole distance at one time. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama and the Democratic majority is estopped from making any such claim now. To make such a claim is an admission by them that this bill does contain protective rates, a proposition which was most vigorously denied when this same bill was under consideration at the special session. It was then claimed by every Democratic Member who spoke upon the subject that this bill was purely a revenue measure; that it had no other design than to produce revenue.

The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, in their report upon this bill at the special session, used the following language:

> The most important feature to be kept in mind in revising Schedule I in the interest of the welfare of the general public is that the rates be made truly competitive as far as possible—that is, that they be made low enough to permit potential competition from imports for the sake of natural and proper regulation of domestic prices.

The gentleman from Alabama, in opening the debate upon this bill at the special session, had a colloquy with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], as follows:

> Mr. HINDS. The gentleman says this cotton bill is framed solely to the end of the revenue in view?
> Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the gentleman can doubt that proposition.
> Mr. HINDS. Therefore, does the gentleman say also that it leaves out entirely the principle of protection?
> Mr. UNDERWOOD. Absolutely, so far as my knowledge is concerned.

It therefore does not lie in the mouth of any Democrat to now claim that when this bill was presented at the special session that there was in the minds of the Democratic majority any other thought than that this was purely a revenue measure, and that if enacted into law it would permit a sufficient competition from abroad to regulate prices in this country.

Upon this plain cotton cloth fabric it must be entirely clear now to every Member of the House that the rates in this bill are not sufficiently low to permit any competition, that they are not sufficiently low to provide any revenue to the Government, and I shall await with great curiosity an explanation from the other side as to how they propose to raise revenue for the Government under the rates proposed in the cloth paragraph of this bill. They can only do so by completely reversing their position with reference to the Tariff Board, by claiming that whereas a year ago they claimed that the findings of the Tariff Board would favor protected interests, that now the findings of the Tariff Board are unjust to protected interests in that they do not justify as high tariff rates as protected interests are entitled to receive.

But to get back to the cloth paragraph of the cotton schedule. The report of the board shows that duties greater than 5 to 20 per cent can not be sustained from either a Democratic or Republican standpoint.

But that is not all in this paragraph. The bill adds 5 per cent ad valorem for cloth bleached, dyed, colored, and so forth, or what is known as finishing, while the facts presented by the board show beyond peradventure that the cost of finishing is less in this country than in England. I challenge any Member on the Democratic side of the House to defend this additional rate of 5 per cent, and before this debate is over I demand that they either give some reason for imposing this burden upon the people or else strike it out from the bill.

I can not go through the bill in detail within the time allotted me. According to the report of the board, the other rates in the bill are not greatly different than those warranted by the report of the board. Some duties are higher than are necessary and some are lower than are warranted by the report.

The bill as a whole, as stated by the chairman, reduces duties from 48 per cent ad valorem under the present law to 27 per cent ad valorem. The report of the board shows that the rates can be still further lowered both from a Democratic and Republican standpoint. From computations which I have made, I am satisfied that an average rate of 20 per cent ad valorem can be sustained from a protective standpoint, and surely a higher rate can not be defended from a revenue standpoint.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] will, I understand, offer a substitute to this bill, levying duties from the standpoint of protection to the American industry. I have carefully gone over his figures, and while some of them are higher than I believe are warranted by the board, yet, recognizing the difficulties of classification, and in view of the fact that the rates proposed by him are lower in the main than in the Democratic bill, I shall have no hesitation in giving it my support.

And in this connection permit me to say that while I have often differed with the gentleman from Connecticut in tariff matters, especially as to the reciprocity bill, too much credit can not be given him for the fearless stand he has taken upon this schedule and upon the woolen schedule. He comes from New England, supposedly the section receiving greater benefits than any other from high protection, but when he has the facts before him as they have been presented by the Tariff Board, he honestly applies those facts to these two tariff bills, regardless of whether such action condemns the Payne-Aldrich bill or not. The American producer has a right to expect protection from undue competition from abroad when the cost of production is greater here. He who demands more than that is not a Republican. He is the greatest enemy the Republican Party has. If in the years to come Republicans generally will follow the example of the gentleman from Connecticut in his treatment of the cotton and woolen schedules, then the principle of protection to American industries will be safely intrenched as one of the established policies of this Nation, and all of the misrepresentations and academic theories of the Democracy shall not prevail against it.

I have said that the general average of the duties in the substitute to be proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut is less than the Democratic bill. The average in the Democratic bill is 27 per cent ad valorem. Now, I ask you to follow me for a moment in the consideration of what these reductions from the Payne-Aldrich law mean to the American people according to Democratic authority.

In the debate upon this bill at the special session the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the Ways and Means Committee, stated:

> It is believed by our committee that the revenue will not be materially disturbed and that the burden of taxation upon the American people will be lifted to the amount of $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON states that the Committee on Ways and Means believed that this bill will save the American people $200,000,000 annually. While, as a matter of fact, this amount is largely exaggerated, for the purpose of my argument I will assume that it is correct. The Democratic majority can not complain if I make that assumption, for I am merely adopting for the time being their own theory.

If this pending Democratic bill would save the American people $200,000,000 per year, then the Hill bill, by the same reasoning, would save the American people more than $221,000,000 per year, for the Democratic bill reduced duties from 48 to 27 per cent ad valorem, while the Hill bill reduced duties from 48 to 25 per cent ad valorem. In other words, the Hill bill reduced duties 48 per cent while the Democratic bill is a reduction of only 44 per cent.

When the vote is taken upon the Hill bill and the solid Democratic majority vote against it, as I expect they will, I give Democratic Members notice now that they will have some explaining to do in the fall campaign. It will not suffice for them to rail against the Payne-Aldrich law.

It is a matter of sincere regret to me that the Republican minority of the Committee on Ways and Means has not seen fit to indorse the Hill bill in a minority report or offer any bill revising the cotton schedule. I believe the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is the only member of the Republican minority that proposes affirmative action upon the part of the Republicans revising the cotton schedule.

At the special session last year when this same bill was under consideration and just before its passage the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] made the following motion to recommit the bill:

> Mr. PAYNE moves to recommit the bill H. R. 12812 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to that committee to hold the bill in committee until the Tariff Board makes report to Congress of the information secured by said Tariff Board in regard to the production, manufacture, use, and consumption of cotton goods, and especially covering every element of the cost of production, and to report said bill back to the House with such provisions and amendments as it may deem proper after examination and consideration of the information so reported by the Tariff Board.

The Tariff Board has reported now. The Democratic majority has ignored that report and apparently a majority of the Republican minority of the Committee on Ways and Means has also voted to ignore it, for otherwise they would have presented as a minority a bill revising the cotton schedule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. With regard to the action taken originally by the minority upon the Hill bill, I can state to the gentleman that it came at a time when definite assurance, practically, had been given by the leader of the majority that a cotton bill would not be reported at this session of Congress. This meeting was called with only a day's notice, and it was the first time that any members of the minority committee had an opportunity to inspect the bill offered by Mr. HILL. Therefore definite action was not taken for the reason stated at the time that the members of the minority desired some further time to look into it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I do not, of course, question the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, if the minority members of the Committee on Ways and Means shall vote for this Hill bill when the vote is taken, then I shall regard it as a complete explanation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that he will be satisfied to some extent, at any rate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I, of course, in reading the report assumed that that was the action of the minority committee—it so states that they did not propose to offer any affirmative legislation, and I am satisfied, I say, if that was the attitude of the minority of the committee it does not represent the wishes or the sentiments of the Republican membership of this House.

An overwhelming majority of the Republicans in this House are sincere in their desire that this question be investigated by a Tariff Board, and after investigation honestly and impartially made, they are willing to act upon that information. I am confident that the Hill bill will receive practically the unanimous support of this side of the House.

In line with the position taken by a majority of the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means is the attitude of the American Protective Tariff League. As is well known, the American Protective Tariff League vigorously opposed the creation of a Tariff Board, and no tariff could be placed so high that would not meet with its approval. Its membership is made up very largely of that class of citizens who seem to believe that the great purpose of the Constitution of the United States was to protect industrial wrongs. They are loud in their profession of fealty to "constitutional government." They denounce at every opportunity any change in the Constitution, and they grow red in the face condemning such revolutionary theories as the initiative, referendum, and recall. That is, they do that when they fear that those things may interfere in the slightest degree with their control of government and their special privilege existing by virtue of that control.

But such things do not seem dangerous when they would like to use them for their own purposes, to illustrate which I wish to quote from a letter received by me—no doubt similar letters were received by other Members—from Wilbur F. Wakeman, treasurer and general secretary of the Protective Tariff League:

> We earnestly recommend that all tariff reduction measures should be submitted to the people of this country in November. We mean by this that the measures now proposed and pending shall be submitted to the voters of this country, and we have not a doubt as to what the voters of this country will decide.

Reference of these measures to the "mob," or to the "bleachers," as my friend from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL, would term it, advocated by the treasurer and general secretary of the American Protective Tariff League! Evidently they regard the referendum as a most meritorious thing when used to delay action against the public interest, but a vicious thing when used in the public interest.

I am not one who fears to submit these matters at the coming election, as is suggested by the American Protective Tariff League, but I want definite proposals by the Democratic Party and definite proposals by the Republican Party as to just what they propose to do, as is done in this case by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

But there is no occasion for delaying action. If the people disapprove of any action taken by either Republicans or Democrats, that disapproval will find itself evidenced in tariff legislation enacted at a special session of Congress in 1913.

If the Republican membership of this House shall, in the consideration of this measure, show their sincerity in advocating a tariff board by voting for the Hill bill, which will be proposed, their action will do much to insure a Republican majority in the next House. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has 53½ minutes remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I favor the bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut and shall be unable, in any event, to vote for the bill presented by the Democratic majority. I voted for the La Follette wool bill, although I did not like its general plan, and considered it imperfect in many respects, because I believed it removed the most objectionable features in the present law; but when this opportunity of removing these objectionable features and offering relief against them to the people was given to our Democratic friends, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON], speaking for them, told us that they would revise the tariff in their own time, in their own way, and absolutely according to their own plan, or not at all. For myself this reply was not unexpected. They will have an opportunity now to accept a bill which corrects the errors in the cotton schedule and affords the consumer all proper relief. I expect their answer to the proposition made through the bill presented by the gentleman from Connecticut will be the same as before, but I imagine there will be hereafter less of the talk on their part that they desire to relieve the consumer by lowering the tariff rate, and certainly they must abandon their claim that the Republican Party is not willing to do anything in this direction.

If the Underwood bill, now presented by the Democratic majority, removed any of the objectionable features of the present law, or corrected any evil growing out of it, without causing a greater injury, I trust I am not such a hidebound partisan that I would be unwilling to accept it; but the fact is that it makes no improvement on the present law in any direction, corrects no evil existing in it, and must inevitably injure our manufacturers if put in force.

What can be said in defense of a bill, from the standpoint of any Republican, which raises the tariff on goods which are manufactured cheaper here than abroad—upon which the tariff is now prohibitory—but which lowers the duty on goods which are already being imported in large quantities? The great bulk of the cotton goods used in this country are manufactured at home and sold at a less price than they can be bought abroad and shipped here. Upon this class of goods the rates are now prohibitory. The Democratic bill leaves them prohibitory, and even increases them in some instances. The substantial reductions that are made by the Democratic bill are in connection with the goods as to which our manufacturers now with difficulty compete with foreigners and which, as a rule, are used more largely by people in comfortable circumstances.

On the former discussion of the Democratic bill the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] admitted that the rates had been raised on some grades, and excused the raise on the ground that the importations of the goods on which the duties were thus raised were inconsiderable and that the rates had been lowered where the importations had been large. I did not expect to find that the bill had in fact taken a form so absurd, but an examination of it shows that a large portion of it is so drawn as to effectively condemn it.

Lest this statement should seem overdrawn, I propose to support it by a few illustrations, of which I could give a large number did my time permit. During the former debate on this bill it was shown from the report that accompanied it that a very small quantity of bleached muslin cloth, valued not to exceed 9 cents per yard, was imported in 1910. The duty on this, according to the same report, was less than 11 per cent ad valorem, and the small quantity imported showed that it was practically prohibitory. This rate is raised by the Underwood bill to 20 per cent. Perhaps a better illustration of how the Democratic bill works out is found in sample No. 9, referred to in the table of samples given in the tariff report. It is bleached cheesecloth, and is manufactured in this country and sold at the mills for 2.62 cents. The selling price in England is 3.62 cents. In such an instance even a nominal tariff of 5 per cent, proposed by the Hill bill, is unnecessary, but the Underwood bill keeps it at 20 per cent. Unbleached sheeting containing not to exceed 100 threads to the square inch is now quoted by all the mills of this country at lower prices than at the mills of England, yet the duty on this class of goods is kept in the Underwood bill at from 15 to 20 per cent. Sample No. 19 of the Tariff Board, bleached Persian lawn, is made cheaper in this country than abroad. The Underwood bill puts a tariff on it of 25 per cent. Sample 46, bleached and printed organdie, is also manufactured here cheaper, and again the Underwood bill puts a 25 per cent rate upon it. In the list of 100 samples of various kinds of cloth given in the Tariff Board's report, 40 are shown to be sold at a less price in this country than abroad without any duty, but the Underwood bill still maintains a high rate upon these goods.

Where the rate is prohibitory, to make a new rate which is still prohibitory means nothing. It is a change, but a change that is needless and useless. Staple cotton goods, as I have before stated, are sold in this country at the mill doors for less than they can be bought abroad. What excuse can be given for maintaining rates of which the instances given above are fair examples? Why not bring them down to those fixed by the Republican bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]? I know of no good reason and none can be given unless it be that these goods are largely manufactured by the southern mills; that the southern Democrats are now in control and ready to slash the rates that apply only to the products of the northern mills, but maintain them prohibitory as to factory products of the South. It is true that most of these rates are lower than those under the present law, but the present law affects nobody and injures no one on these staples as to which the American mill is already the cheapest place in all the world at which to buy them. The rates of the Democratic bill are not low enough to affect these mills if they saw fit to go into a combination, rumors of which are now in the air. For real reduction on these goods we must look to the Republican bill, which imposes on them merely a nominal rate.

If the majority desires to eradicate an evil that has grown up under the present law, it might have found an opportunity under the thread schedule. The combination of the thread manufacturers has resulted in the formation of one of the few trusts known to the cotton industry. It would have been supposed, after all the outcry which has been made on the other side against trusts, that this combination would have received a cut in rates deeper than in any other line. A reduction was indeed made, but it was not one that will in the slightest way affect this trust. It should have gone far lower—as the Republican bill does.

When we come to schedules as to which our manufacturers now compete with difficulty with the foreigners, and of which the imports are large and increasing, we find that the revenue principle upon which the Democratic bill was framed has been relentlessly applied. As a matter of course, if severe cuts are made in these schedules the importations will largely increase and we will receive more revenue, but as we do not need the revenue it would hardly seem advisable even from a Democratic standpoint, and certainly this plan can commend itself to no Republican. If more goods are imported, the inevitable result is the displacement of our manufactures and a loss of wages to our workingmen. If the tariff is to be framed for revenue only, this is immaterial. For those, however, who wish to see our money kept at home and our wage earners given employment, this is a matter of the highest importance.

An example of how the bill was framed in relation to goods now imported in large quantities abroad is found in the plush schedule, which is reduced by the Underwood bill more than 40 per cent, and in the report accompanying this bill it was estimated that the 1910 exports would increase under it about $267,000. As a matter of fact, they increased over $1,400,000 without any change in the law, and now it is proposed to nearly cut the rate in two by the Underwood bill. The result of such a proposition will be simply to close the American mills without any appreciable benefit to the consumer and with a great loss to American labor.

Heretofore, whenever the cotton schedule was mentioned, gentlemen on the other side have presented some tables, made by I know not whom, showing inordinate profits claimed to have been made by some of the great mills which manufacture staple cotton goods. The accuracy of these tables has been denied, but I care nothing about the question so raised at this time. Has this bill sought to reach the great mills? No. It strikes at the small manufacturer—the plush-goods makers, the knit-goods industry, the makers of chenille, and the like. In these goods the imports are already large and increasing. Of the plush goods there was three times as much imported in 1911 as in 1910; of chenille twice as much. So severe reductions in the rates on these goods, as are contemplated by the Underwood bill, simply means that in many branches the American mills and manufacturers will no longer be able to compete and must give way to the foreign producers.

The hosiery schedule, as it now stands, may be admitted to be faulty in some respects, especially in that the duty on cheap hose ought to be lowered. The small mills making hosiery are scattered all over the country, and the gentleman from Connecticut, in preparing the Republican bill, cut this schedule to the bone. My own calculations, taken from the report of the Tariff Board, would indicate that the industry could not stand the rates which he proposed, but I have such a high opinion of him as an authority on this subject that I yield out of deference to his views. The Democratic majority, not content with these rates, proceeded to go still further and lower and make up a hosiery schedule which, according to the report of the Tariff Board, would close every hosiery mill in this country except those making certain brands of a class not easily obtained abroad. What reason can be given for this? On the former discussion of this bill the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was asked by the gentleman from New York if he did not know that hosiery and stockings, considering the quality, were cheaper in this country than ever before, nothwithstanding an advance of from 25 to 50 per cent in the cost of cotton. The gentleman from Alabama did not deny the claim thus made, but said that it was because of a Republican panic. Where was the "panic"? The same kind of a "panic" now prevails and the same prices on hosiery are maintained. Who is there that does not know that hosiery is cheaper than it was 20 years ago? If there is any doubt upon the subject, I would refer to table No. 4, given by Senator BURTON in his recent speech on the cost of living, which shows the scale of prices on hosiery for each year since 1890. Hosiery is somewhat higher than it was 10 years ago, but the advance is not equal to the proportionate advance in wages or in other commodities. No one claims that there is any trust among the hosiery mills; on the contrary, it is acknowledged that there is the keenest competition between them. This is the only country in the world in which you can buy at any price hose warranted to stand any kind of wear for six months. What reason can be given then for destroying this industry which produced nearly $60,000,000 worth of manufactured products in 1909?

The knit-goods industry, which is so seriously affected by the Democratic bill, paid $44,000,000 in wages to the American workingman, by him again to be distributed to the farmers and other workingmen who supplied the articles that entered into his living expenses.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] stated that the Democratic Members of this House were sent here by the consumers and were interested in the consumers alone. Like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I know of no one who is merely a consumer except the tramp and individuals whose occupation is that of collecting rents or cutting off coupons. The producer and consumer must stand together. I speak for perhaps the largest class of producers—the American farmer—who has learned by bitter experience that when the mills are closed and the wages of their operatives stop that the market for his produce is gone. He knows that money sent abroad to buy manufactured goods does not find its way back to him. He has found that he and the mill worker must stand together hand in hand to maintain adequate wages for one and a home market for the other.

It is no argument to say that because the Republican bill averages somewhat lower than the Underwood bill that therefore Republicans should be willing to accept it. Averages are no criterion for that purpose. One might as well tell a farmer that a harness which was weak here and there but had increased strength somewhere else averaged well, or that a wagon tongue that was unnecessarily heavy in front and weak to the point of danger at the rear averaged stronger than one which was made of the proper dimensions, or that a corn planter that dropped one kernel in one hill and five in others was averaging the right number. Each separate item of a tariff bill might be utterly wrong and yet be of the same average as one properly prepared. The reductions in the Hill bill, while far beyond some of those in the Underwood bill in some items, continue to give the active, energetic, and up-to-date manufacturer an opportunity to pursue his business and give employment to his men on the American scale of wages, the highest known in the world. The Underwood bill would accomplish nothing except to ruin the manufacturer in certain lines and deprive his employees of their wages.

I have taken the figures which I present from the report of the Tariff Board. It is not necessary at this time to make any defense of this board. The Underwood bill itself furnishes an unanswerable argument in defense of the Tariff Board report. Who is there that does not know that the Underwood bill would not have been drawn in its present form if the report had been in existence when the bill was prepared? The bill now is only adhered to because to change it would be only to admit the necessity of a Tariff Board, and it would be necessary for the new bill to run the gauntlet of another caucus.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] frankly admits that were it not for the information supplied by the Tariff Board he would not have thought it possible to make the reductions proposed by his bill, and what excuse is given by the Democratic majority for not accepting the rates proposed by him? None whatever, except the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] to which I have already referred, namely, that the majority proposed to revise the tariff in its own way or not at all. I leave it for the public to judge whether this is any defense of the bill in which I have shown such glaring defects to exist.

A favorite phrase with the Members of the Democratic majority when discussing their tariff bills is that they desire to lessen the burdens which rest upon the people. Even the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has adopted it.

Well, the Democratic Party has established a reputation as a burden lifter through tariff legislation. By the Wilson bill it took from the workingman the burden of labor and left him free to tramp the road. It took from the manufacturer the burden of keeeping his mill in motion, for nobody had money with which to buy his products. It took from the merchant the burden of attending to his business, for it left him no business which needed his attention. It took from the farmer the burden of hauling his crops to market, for it left him no market worth the hauling.

The Democratic Party never has given the country tariff legislation which has not been followed by financial depression and commercial distress. It has never enacted a tariff measure which after six months of trial the people have not clamored to have torn from our statute books. When sufficient time has expired so that a new generation of voters has appeared on the scene and the memory of its former actions has become somewhat faded, then it seeks to beguile the public once more by raising the cry that a tariff for revenue only would benefit the consumer. It may create a wave of discontent upon which it will ride into power, but history will repeat itself and the people, taught again by bitter experience, will return to take up those principles which have given the laborer employment at the highest wages paid anywhere on the broad earth; which have furnished a market for the crops of the farmer and a demand for the products of the manufacturer; which has kept trade and commerce in motion and given a degree of prosperity to this Nation that has never before been equaled. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the following official letter was given to the public press by the writer at the same time that it was sent to the recipient. It is deemed perfectly proper that it should be disclosed for the benefit of Congress; therefore I submit it under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 30, 1912.

Hon. W. C. ADAMSON,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ADAMSON: I have had brought to my attention the report of your committee on the omnibus dam bill (H. R. 25882), in which you discuss my objections to the said bill in its present form. I have also had brought to my attention the debate in the House yesterday on the same subject.

You quite misunderstand my position if you think that the question of the right to obtain compensation for the Federal Government from the grantees of the privileges conveyed by these bills is merely theoretic. On the contrary, it is one of the most practical questions confronting the War Department at the present time. One of the most important engineering projects now confronting the country is the method of improving our navigable rivers by what is known as the "slack-water" method. This method is applicable to a very large number of rivers in this country, which in their natural condition are too swift or too shallow for ordinary commerce. The method consists in building throughout the length of these rivers a series of dams, by which the river is converted into a succession of deep pools adequate for commerce of a far more important character than what could use the river in its unimproved condition. In fact, many rivers which are not capable in their natural state of being used at all commercially can by this method be made useful and available for important commerce.

As you may know, under sanction of Congress this "slack-water" method of improvement is being applied already to very many of our rivers, including the Ohio, the Monongahela, the Muskingum, the Little Kanawha, the Great Kanawha, the Big Sandy, the Kentucky, the Green, and Barren Rivers, and very many others unnecessary now to enumerate. The method, however, is an expensive one, and on account of its cost the Nation has as yet been unable to extend it to countless streams where it would be very useful.

Most of the dams thus constructed in a "slack-water" improvement, particularly in the rapid portions of the streams, will create water power of commercial value. Now, it is manifest that unless the commercial value of the water power thus created can be applied by Congress toward continuing and extending this method of improvement of the stream in question a very much greater financial burden for the improvement of the stream will fall upon the general taxpayers of the country and will therefore necessarily retard and postpone the improvement of our rivers for navigation. On the other hand, if Congress avails itself of this asset and applies it to the improvement of the navigation of our rivers the Nation will be very much more speedily placed in the condition of having all of its rivers available for commerce.

Again, as a matter of constitutional law, I can not see that it makes the slightest difference whether the Federal Government builds these dams in the first place at its own expense, thereby, as is generally agreed, obtaining for itself the value of the water power thus created, or whether, assuming that the stream is navigable and the dam an element in the improvement of the stream, the Government chooses to have the dam constructed by a private person as its agent, giving to the private person in return for his action a portion of the value of the water power created. By thus combining the improvement of the river for navigation with the legitimate desire of private parties to develop water power in that neighborhood a great improvement in the navigation of the river can be initiated through this cooperation at a time when otherwise the improvement might be indefinitely delayed. What the Government has the right to do by itself in the interest of navigation it can do through the agency of another.

Now, I am informed by the Chief of Engineers that every one of the rivers included in the omnibus dam bill (H. R. 25882) is susceptible of improvement by the "slack-water" method, and that each of the dams for which the permit is asked will create pools which may be made available for such an improvement. My former recommendations to you, when the bills were first sent me, were intended to bring out this fact. Unless this bill is amended so as to give to the Secretary of War authority to exact proper compensation for the right thus created and to apply it to the future improvement of the navigation of the river by other dams, I do not believe that I have authority under the general dam act to exact such compensation. While its construction is not free from doubt, I believe that the compensation which the general dam act authorizes the Secretary of War to exact would be limited to compensation sufficient to maintain the physical condition of the dam and its locks, and, if necessary, to compel the dam to be torn down or modified should it in future be deemed an obstruction in the river. If you agree with me in the propositions I have heretofore attempted to set out, I think you will agree with me that Congress should not leave the power of the Secretary of War in these premises in any doubt or confusion. In the report of your committee you do not inform me flatly whether your view coincides or differs with mine on this point. You do not, in other words, inform me whether you think that the conditions which the general dam act authorizes me to impose will include compensation of the character which I have outlined above. In the interest of harmonious cooperation by my department with your committee on a subject within our joint jurisdiction and which is of such a great public importance, I should be very glad if you would kindly advise me as to this question.

The development and utilization of these water powers is a most important matter and should not be delayed. The development of the navigability of our rivers for commerce is of equal importance and merits equally prompt treatment. A solution, therefore, which will permit both developments to go hand in hand and by which the interests of the public will be protected and not sacrificed should not be retarded through uncertainty or ambiguity in the phraseology of a statute.

Very respectfully,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

It is equally appropriate that the following official reply to the foregoing letter should be communicated to Congress and to the public, therefore, at the same time that the letter is transmitted to the War Department. I submit it also to the consideration of Congress under the same permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1912.

Hon. H. L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have received your communication of the 30th ultimo in relation to certain dam bills now pending. I appreciate the kindly spirit of your letter and assure you that, in common with the committee over which I have the honor to preside, I appreciate your situation and honor your high character and great ability. I would be glad to secure your cooperation in promoting the interests of the people by permitting progress on the projects in question. Your letter presents a singular admixture of correct statement of facts long well known, unwarranted conclusions, and erroneous opinions of both law and fact.

Your apt description of the shoal rivers of the country, the method in vogue to a limited extent of pooling them by dams to permit slack-water navigation, clearly depicts the situation apparent to us all 15 years ago when we undertook the discussion and preparation of a general dam act to serve the double purpose of aiding the Government to hasten the navigation of those streams by consenting for the owners of the shoals and the riparian lands to develop their water power and use it at their own expense. It was estimated that projects had been approved to the amount of about $400,000,000 to be promoted by the Government at the cost of the Treasury.

There were other streams and parts of streams, however, capable of navigation by the slack-water method where no projects had been approved and where the Government had no purpose of spending any money in the near future. To make these navigable it was estimated would require about $600,000,000 more. The people who needed the transportation to be afforded by those rivers were dismayed by the remote prospect of improvement by the Federal Government at the rate of progress being made. Nobody believed that the billion dollars necessary to improve all of those streams would be expended by the Government in centuries. It is slow progress being made toward the completion of even the approved projects. Many shoals on the streams where no projects had been undertaken nor even considered by the Government invited the development of valuable water power, which, by the dams constructed, would create ponds or lakes and make navigation of large extent and value. Yet, as the Federal Government asserted jurisdiction over every stream any part of which was nominally navigable, dams could not be built therein without the consent of the Government. Where the Government was willing to incur the expense of the lock and dam, acquiring property rights, and paying for riparian rights, and all other expenses, it would thereby become the property owner as well as the sovereign. As such owner of the premises it would also own the power generated and could sell or lease it. The former owners having been paid by the Government for the land taken or overflowed by its action, purchase, or condemnation would be satisfied and the consumers of power would be content to lease it from the Government.

The difficulty was the projects were so numerous and expensive that it was and still is impracticable for the Government to construct and operate all those enterprises rapidly enough to promote the interests of the people, the development of the country, and the navigation of the rivers. So the general dam act was formulated, not to operate on Government projects at all, but to permit the owners of shoals and riparian lands to improve the water power on sites where the Federal Government had neither approved nor contemplated any projects on condition that the structures should conform to the direction of and meet the approval of the War Department, so as to foster and promote navigation in harmony with any present ideas on the subject of improving the streams or any plans that might be adopted in the future, to that end even giving way and going out of existence if subsequently plans should be adopted inconsistent with the use of the structure. In that act we did not trench at all upon any enterprise or right of the Government as to any projects or interests of its own, but limited its scope to granting the consent of the Government for property owners to utilize their property which the Government was not ready to take or to use, on condition that in so using their own property the owner should conform to any general plans for the improvement of the stream and help the Government by such structure as would promote navigability, which the Government might not yet be ready to promote at its own expense.

Some of the conditions which the Secretary of War may impose in approving plans are as follows, taken from the general dam act:

"Such dam shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such dam and accessory works; and when the plans and specifications for any dam to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans or specifications either before or after completion of the structure unless the modification of such plans or specifications has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War: Provided, That in approving the plans, specifications, and location for any dam, such conditions and stipulations may be imposed as the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may deem necessary to protect the present and future interests of the United States, which may include the condition that the persons constructing or maintaining such dam shall construct, maintain, and operate, without expense to the United States, in connection with any dam and accessory or appurtenant works, a lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structure or structures which the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers or Congress at any time may deem necessary in the interests of navigation, in accordance with such plans as they may approve, and also that whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of a lock or other structures for navigation purposes in connection with such dam, the persons owning such dam shall convey to the United States, free of cost, title to such land as may be required for such constructions and approaches, and shall grant to the United States free water power or power generated from water power for building and operating such constructions: Provided further, That in acting upon said plans as aforesaid the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War shall consider the bearing of said structure upon a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway over which it is to be constructed with a view to the promotion of its navigable quality and for the full development of water power; and, as a part of the conditions and stipulations imposed by them, shall provide for improving and developing navigation, and fix such charge or charges for the privilege granted as may be sufficient to restore conditions with respect to navigability as existing at the time such privilege be granted or reimburse the United States for doing the same, and for such additional or further expense as may be incurred by the United States with reference to such project, including the cost of any investigations necessary for approval of plans and of such supervision of construction as may be necessary in the interests of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That the right is hereby reserved to the United States to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam built in accordance with the provisions of this act, a suitable lock or locks, booms, sluices, or any other structures for navigation purposes, and at all times to control the said dam and the level of the pool caused by said dam to such an extent as may be necessary to provide proper facilities for navigation.

"SEC. 3. That the persons constructing, maintaining, or operating any dam or appurtenant or accessory works, in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise. The persons owning or operating any such dam, or accessory works, subject to the provisions of this act, shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon and such fishways as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe, and for failure so to do in any respect shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not less than $500, and each month of such failure shall constitute a separate offense and subject such persons to additional penalties therefor.

"SEC. 4. That all rights acquired under this act shall cease and be determined if the person, company, or corporation acquiring such rights shall, at any time, fail, after receiving reasonable notice thereof, to comply with any of the provisions and requirements of the act, or with any of the stipulations and conditions that may be prescribed as aforesaid by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, including the payment into the Treasury of the United States of the charges provided for by section 1 of this act: Provided, That Congress may revoke any rights conferred in pursuance of this act whenever it is necessary for public use. * * * And provided also, That the authority granted under or in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall terminate at the end of a period not to exceed 50 years from the date of the original approval of the project under this act, unless sooner revoked as herein provided or Congress shall otherwise direct.

"SEC. 7. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved as to any and all dams which may be constructed in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the United States shall incur no liability for the alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof to the owner or owners or any other persons interested in any dam which shall have been constructed in accordance with its provisions."

Severe pains and penalties follow the disregard of those conditions when imposed or if projects be undertaken before they are imposed. Every interest of the Government is safeguarded if the Secretary of War does his duty in accordance with the provisions of the act. In your former letters you suggested that the pending bill be so amended as to authorize you to regulate the charges and the relations between the power company and the consumers, also to authorize you "to fix a charge for the privilege granted." I respectfully suggest that when the transmission wires cross State lines and the company engages in business between different States there is no doubt that then, and not until then, the right and power of Federal regulation attaches under the commerce clause of the Constitution. Otherwise the Federal Government has no concern with those relations, which are strictly within the jurisdiction reserved exclusively to the States. In every bill reported we have expressly required State action and responsibility as a condition of consent by providing in every instance where the promoters are not already shown to be authorized by the State that the consent shall take effect only when so authorized by the State wherein located.

Your other demand, which seems to be the leading if not the main topic of your last letter, is that the Secretary of War be authorized by amendment of each bill to "charge for the privilege granted," and you ask whether or not that power is clearly conferred upon you by the general dam act. There is no doubt that the act authorizes you "to fix charges for the privileges granted," for it expressly says so.

The difficulty arises from inability to agree as to what constitutes the privilege granted. We believe the consent to be to build a dam on the builder's own land at the builder's own expense and risk, in strict accord with plans and purposes of the Government in order, without expense to the Government, to create slack-water navigation for the Government as complete and satisfactory as if the Government had incurred the expense of several hundred thousand dollars to accomplish the improvement, which, it seems to us, constitutes some compensation for the privilege. The power of control, condemnation, and taxation over the promoters, their customers, and their property, is in the State. I observe that in reporting on two bills proposing dams at one site you insist on the same conditions where a city desired to build a dam for public utility as you sought to impose on a water-power company. It seems to me your argument led you up to a rather strange position when you failed to relax or modify your insistence at that point. The general dam act confers upon you all the powers in respect to fixing compensation that Congress can constitutionally delegate. The difficulty in making progress under the general dam act is not found in peril to the rights of the Government or of the people, but consists in securing or, rather, failing to secure capital available to assume the burdens and risks of operation under the conditions imposed. Capitalists hesitate to operate and build under the hard and possibly unprofitable exactions of the general dam act. Your suggestion of a scheme by which the Government can make the landowner the agent of the Government, gratuitously to build, at his own expense on his own land, a lock and dam which he will operate for the benefit of the Government and under the direction of the Government as to navigation and in addition give to the Government the profits from water power with which the Government may build another dam is a splendid idea if you can find capitalists easy enough to be worked that way, but practical experience fails to find that kind of capitalists.

As to the 10 projects pending, it is indicated by the reports of your engineers that the Government will probably not undertake the improvement of navigation on any of the streams involved for generations to come, but that the prospect of profitable water power may induce capitalists to promote slack-water navigation for the benefit of the Government and the people, under the direction of the Government, if permitted to use the water power developed at their own expense for the benefit of themselves and the people, thereby relieving the people from the oppressive exactions of coal and transportation monopolies.

The only exception among the 10 projects is the one on the site of Lock and Dam No. 18, on the Coosa River, which is one of thirty-odd projects planned by the Government more than a quarter of a century ago. Only three or four of the thirty-odd dams have been constructed on a stream which the expenditure of fifteen or twenty million dollars would convert into the most important domestic waterway in this or any other country, providing cheap transportation for over 900 miles of river through the best country and among the best people the world ever saw. Yet with all the prevalent talk by people who do not correctly apprehend existing conditions, this work of such transcendant importance is held in abeyance, the Government failing to proceed itself and misguided objectors refusing to allow its accomplishment by private capital on terms alike beneficial to the promoters, the Government, and the public. Reporting that project is an exception to our rule and was not originally contemplated by the general dam act, but the Government is not proceeding with it nor with about 30 others on the same stream. In this case capitalists propose to take up the plans of the Government, build the dam and lock as specified by the Government, save the Government all expense, promote the navigation by a long pool of slack water, and comply with any terms the Secretary of War may impose. He has it under the immediate care and supervision of the Board of Engineers, and there is no possibility of loss or injury to anybody if the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers do their duty.

As to these 10 projects, I think you are demanding a great deal, and I trust you will not use your powerful official position and personal influence to obstruct and arrest the universal development of resources promised in these projects for the relief of people all over the country from the clutches of monopoly and trusts to enable them to enjoy prosperity in their day and generation. I know you would not purposely do so, but your views are contrary to the reports of your engineers; they are in conflict with the opinions of lawyers and practical business men everywhere and inimical to the interests of all the people.

Instead of conserving resources, as vainly pretended by some people, those views oppose progress, deny to the people the use of the bounty with which nature has blessed them, and antagonize local authority and responsibility. But you may be right, and we may be wrong, on these propositions. If you think so, please advise those Members of Congress who entertain your views to refrain from obstruction and objections which prevent consideration of those bills. It is impossible to debate or amend them unless their consideration is permitted. Let them withdraw their objections to consideration and then offer on the floor of the House the amendments you suggest. Then the amendments can be debated and voted upon, but not otherwise. That is the only fair and candid course to pursue. If Congress wishes to adopt those amendments, it will certainly be able to do so, regardless of our position, if those who insist on amendment will only be consistent and permit Congress to consider and vote upon their amendments. Our own view is that even if you are correct in insisting on your amendments, they ought to be placed on the general dam act instead of in each particular bill. We have now taken up again the consideration of amending the general dam act. We think it wise to promote harmony in a general plan by a general act, rather than to make the various individual bills extended and inharmonious codes of contradictory provisions. We shall ask you and all other objectors and critics to furnish us suggestions and drafts of proposed amendments. So anxious are we to permit progress, development, and prosperity among the people that, as far as right and reason may permit, we are willing to yield our views in order to obviate the objections of those persons in and out of official life who obstruct the concurrent development of water power and promotion of navigation, which by fair treatment to property owners and constitutional recognition of local and personal authority and right may be secured without cost to the Government.

There is a great evil connected with the subject never mentioned in the many reformatory suggestions offered. The more drastic the terms of our consent the less able are the ordinary citizens of moderate means to develop their water-power sites, which but for Federal embargo they would be able to improve in a manner commensurate with their financial ability. Unable to hold unremunerative property, they are forced to sell on the best terms obtainable to those who have the money. The purchasers buy up many of these sites, not for the sole purpose of improving them and charging high prices for the power, which seems to be the only thing dreaded by the critics of the general dam act. The States can regulate those charges, and, unhampered by Federal claims, could and would regulate the property rights. The purchasers may sell one at a high price to somebody else to develop and hold the other sites on speculation, or they may, and often do, improve one and hold all the others to prevent their improvement to create competition. That is the most common form of the evil, though if the Government seeks to improve one or more of the sites for navigation it finds the difficulty and expense of condemnation to be prohibitive. Development of water power and navigation is halted by the effective holdup, unless the Government submits to terms which enrich the masters of the situation. The public will welcome a remedy by amendment of the general dam act, the amendment or enforcement of the antitrust act, or by any other method, but all the other suggestions made sink into insignificance in comparison with the trouble herein referred to.

With high regards and best wishes,

Yours, truly, W. C. ADAMSON, Chairman.

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, with mingled feelings of grief and hope I listened this afternoon to the oration of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I rise to praise it, not to adversely criticize it. This I say because I believe that when the course of an individual or a party has been run, justice, as well as custom, grants to the departed the benediction of a funeral discourse. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, do I, in the name of the admiring and advancing hosts of Democracy, embalm forever in the amber-like history of this day the classical, biblical, tearful, yet hopeful political funeral oration over his party of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. It was an effort worthy of the subject, for notwithstanding all that has been said by its members on this floor of late concerning its most recent performances, the Republican Party will not be denied the tribute of an eloquent and comprehensive funereal farewell. Thanks to the devoted gentleman from Illinois, no facetious Democratic orator can wax dramatic during the campaign and exclaim, as he struts the rostrum describing the Republican Party, with these lines from Shakespeare:

> But yesterday the word of Cæsar might have stood against the world;
> Now lies he there, with none so poor to do him reverence.

How can we ever forget the picture, rhetorical yet melancholy, which the gentleman from Illinois drew of this fair land as he peered into the future and illumined with his imagery the consequences of coming Democratic victory. Piles of twisted machinery here, bleak wastes of abandoned lands over yonder, while from out the débris stand silent and smokeless the chimneys of a million factories. As the orator proceeded with this lugubrious oration methought I saw the ghost of energy and the flitting shade of prosperity dolefully hovering over the country in which they once lived. And then I am sure I heard some wailing voice sobbing in the distance, "Hard times come again no more," while the American people, so industrious, so thrifty, so inventive, so enterprising, and so optimistic under Republican rule, in one horrible resolve dropped all and straightway took to idleness, indifference, and self-inflicted disaster. "Oh my countrymen, what a fall was there."

Then I remembered that for well-nigh two years a Democratic majority has been in control of this branch of the Government, and I wondered how the country had survived through it all, when there came to my mind a brief editorial note in the Republican New York Sun of this morning, as follows:

CHEER UP!

We are not so bad off after all. Here are a few things culled at random from the news in the Sun of yesterday:

Wheat dropped 8 cents a bushel.
The harvests promise to be unusually good.
The price of copper is high.
The coal trade is brisk.
A serious car shortage is promised owing to trade activity and the crops.
Europe owes us a large trade balance.
Congress will adjourn within a month.
And—
It will be lawful to shoot the bull moose full of holes on November 5.

But the gentleman from Illinois left us a few peeping rays of hope. He admitted that even after Democracy had done its worst the sun would still shine, the streams would still flow down to the wider waters, the rain would fall, and the crops would grow. Oh, gracious admission; oh, rainbow of promise, how glorious thou art!

Let no man hereafter say that the gentleman from Illinois is not a progressive Republican, for were he a real standpatter he could not have admitted so much. The standpat phophecies which have made this session of Congress grewsome as well as memorable are all against him, for in those dire forecasts the moon is to lose its mellow light, the sun is to stand still evermore, since it will have nothing worth while to shine upon; crops are to be withered in the blow, and blossoms are to congeal into ice balls in the orchards, while ghastly death wraps all in its smoky mantle, and all on account of Democratic victory.

Surely the admission of the gentleman from Illinois is as a sunbeam through a keyhole to the wretch inside. It is for this reason that I would, if I could, enrich with every gem of literature the funeral oration over the party of the gentleman from Illinois; but the Democracy is already upon us, we hear the rumble of its chariots and discern through lifting mists the splendor of its legions. So we join the gentleman from Illinois and say—

To call the field to rest: and let's away
To part the glories of this happy day.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, and his reply to the same, in regard to a water-power bill I introduced and which was favorably reported upon by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1912.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am inclosing copy of H. R. 24028, with report upon the same from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This bill, as you will see, provides for the construction of locks and dams on the Clinch River, Tenn. This is a unanimous report, and a measure in which the people I represent are vitally interested.

The survey of the Clinch River was authorized by Congress 12 years ago, and as a result a project was recommended for its improvement for navigation for 75 miles. The project provided for crib dams, to cost $1,400,000. This would give slack-water navigation all the year round and enable the coal operators of the district to ship coal by water—cheap transportation.

The coal fields of my district are 300 miles nearer New Orleans than the coal fields of western Pennsylvania. We are completely shut out of the New Orleans and lower Mississippi River markets on account of not having the Clinch River improved. Millions of tons of coal are shipped from western Pennsylvania to New Orleans, and not a ton from my district. It costs about a dollar per ton to ship coal from Pennsylvania to New Orleans by water and $2.25 from my district by rail. As a result, of course we do not sell any coal in New Orleans. If the Clinch River was improved, we would get into this market, and as a result receive our share of the business.

The town in which I live, Knoxville, with a population of over 80,000, and extensively engaged in the manufacturing business, is compelled to pay 50 cents per ton on transportation by rail on steam coal from the mines, 30 miles distant. With the improvement of Clinch River and cheap water navigation we would reduce the cost of this transportation as least one-half.

There are extensive beds of undeveloped iron ore, zinc, and onyx on the Clinch River that could be developed if said river was improved.

In addition to the district engineer recommending the improvement of this river, the Board of Army Engineers only recently pronounced it a meritorious proposition, but did not recommend its immediate improvement.

When the project was recommended for the improvement of Clinch River at a cost of $1,400,000, labor and material was much cheaper than at present.

The Tennessee Hydro-Electric Co., mentioned in the inclosed bill, proposes to build these locks and dams at its own expense, thus relieving the National Government of the expense, etc., of said improvement. Instead of building crib dams, this company would put up concrete dams—more lasting and expensive. This private company would also pay the damages caused from the overflow of farming lands, etc., and maintain, at their expense, the operation of the locks on said river.

Considering the importance of the river and the number of miles to be improved by navigation, I believe this is the best proposition that has been submitted to Congress in the way of compensating the Government for the use of the power to be generated by the construction of locks and dams on a navigable river.

I am endeavoring to pass this bill, and the Speaker has agreed to recognize me to make a motion to suspend the rules and place it upon its passage.

In view of everything that has been published in the press, including a letter that you have only a few days ago written to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I would be pleased to have you write me if, in your judgment, this bill meets with your approval, and if not, kindly point out what changes, in your judgment, should be made.

If you are of the opinion that a certain amount should be paid per horsepower per annum, kindly state said amount, and also if you do not think that the company should be credited with whatever amount your department should find they had expended in providing locks and dams, payment of overflow or damage to property, and annual cost of maintenance and operation of locks.

Thanking you in anticipation,
Respectfully,

R. W. AUSTIN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 1, 1912.

Hon. RICHARD W. AUSTIN,
Representative in Congress, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. AUSTIN: I have your letter of August 1, 1912, and have carefully considered all you say, as well as House Report No. 895, in support of H. R. 24028, authorizing the construction of locks and dams on the Clinch River, Tenn.

As I stated in my letter to Chairman ADAMSON, I believe that one of our great needs is the development of our waterways in the interest of navigation, and this development can be correlated with the much-needed utilization of water-power sites on our navigable streams. Specifically I believe that the public interest will be furthered by the general project on the Clinch River, for the carrying out of which the authority of the Federal Government is sought by H. R. 24028, and I believe that the interests of navigation, the development of commerce, and the fruitful utilization of the water-power sites on the Clinch River can all be reconciled with a proper safeguard of the public interest in the amendments I have heretofore suggested.

Apparently the only difference between the House committee and me is as to the existence of adequate power under the general dam act. To say the least, there is the gravest doubt whether, under the general dam act, I now have the power to exact compensation as one of the conditions for the grant of the privilege, the proceeds of which are to be used in the interest of navigation. If we are agreed that the Secretary of War should have such power, its existence should be put beyond doubt, and there can be no reasonable opposition to the amendment which I suggest. I inclose herewith a draft of the amendment which carries out the suggestions I have made. Of course I believe that a grantee should be credited with all reasonable outlays and contributions in the way of works that relieve the Federal Government from otherwise necessary expenditures. All these and similar considerations are matters for specific adjustment in each case, for, as you will notice, my amendment provides for the fixing of a reasonable charge "under all the circumstances" and for making all due allowances. Undoubtedly proper account should and will be taken for the investment of capital, energy, and enterprise.

As to the second part of the amendment, the committee is of the opinion that the reservation of the right to supervise the price charged to the consumer is sufficiently guarded by the provision reserving the right "to alter, amend, or repeal the act." The reservation of this right to control the charges in nowise involves any presumption that "the several States will be derelict in their responsibility" to the people. There is every reason for presuming the heartiest cooperation between the State and National authorities in the adequate protection of the public in these matters. But the extension of the hydroelectric industry is increasingly becoming an interstate matter, and due provision should be made to guard against the lack of power of the State adequately to control the situation, no less than the exercise of such power as it may have. I, therefore, think that, as a general principle, the reservation of this right to the Federal Government should be made in every bill granting the privilege on a navigable stream. It is true, broadly speaking, that the right to alter or amend caries with it the power to exercise this right in the future. However, I think it is important specifically to reserve this right now, with due notice in advance to all, rather than to unsettle in the future an established situation. Here, again, if the power, as the committee says, is already contained in the general terms of the general dam act, there should be no reasonable objection to its specific expression. This particular amendment embodies in haec verba the amendment introduced by Senator BURTON to the general dam act in his bill S. 6796.

In short, as I have heretofore stated, my amendments merely carry out the carefully considered recommendations of the National Waterways Commission, and spring from the heartiest sympathy with the most effective development of our waterways.

Sincerely, yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

(Copy of amendment to the omnibus dam bill, H. R. 25882, inclosed in letter dated July 30, 1912, from the Secretary of War to Representative WILLIAM KENT.)

"Provided, That in carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of War is authorized to require, as one of the conditions and limitations of the privileges herein granted, that the grantee pay periodically to the United States such sums as the Secretary of War may fix as being reasonable under all the circumstnaces, including due allowance for operating, maintenance, renewal, and depreciation charges, and a reasonable return to the grantee, the proceeds to be used for the development of the stream in respect to which the privilege is granted or waters connected therewith: And provided further, That there is hereby reserved to the Federal Government the right to control the charges for service to the consumers in the event that the law and authority of the State or municipalities where the service is being rendered prove inadequate to protect the public interest."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how much time has been used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has 37½ minutes remaining and the gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 29½ minutes remaining.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I do not expect to yield any further time, and there will be one speech in closing, except I may yield to some gentleman for a minute to extend his remarks. I therefore ask the gentleman to use some of his time.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, when I voted for the Payne bill I voted for a bill which in its operation is shown to be lower in average rates both upon all imports of merchandise and upon dutiable merchandise than the Wilson bill of unfortunate memory. And this illustrates most strikingly the difference between Republican and Democratic tariff bills—the difference between tariff bills framed without regard to their effect upon the industries of the country and without due knowledge and understanding, and bills framed for the purpose of producing sufficient revenue and at the same time keeping the wheels of industry humming and affording abundant opportunities for American labor.

The Republican Party has found that it is possible to maintain prosperous conditions in the country, to keep our mills and factories in operation, under a tariff bill whose average of rates is lower than those of a Democratic tariff bill, under which our industries went into bankruptcy and our people were unable to find employment. We now have before us two bills affecting the cotton industry—a Democratic bill, drawn without regard to its effect upon industries, upon the confession of its authors without regard to them, and a Republican bill, drawn upon full information furnished by the Tariff Board, every item of which has been carefully considered with a view of keeping American mills running and American operatives employed; and yet the Republican bill is lower in its average rates than the Democratic bill. As has been conclusively proven, in my opinion, by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], the practical effect of the two bills would be as wide apart as has been the effect of the Payne bill, on the one hand, and as was the effect of the Wilson bill, on the other. High rates are not in all cases essential to due and proper protection, and all that the Republican Party has ever stood for in its policy of protection are rates high enough to enable Americans to compete fairly with their foreign competitors, to keep the mills and the factories open, to keep industries in operation, to keep our people employed at good wages. I shall vote with a great deal of pleasure for the Republican bill affecting the cotton schedule, which is lower, on the average, than the Democratic bill, and yet so drawn as to protect our people, while the Democratic bill would prove destructive to those portions of the cotton industry which depend on skilled labor and particularly the knit-goods industry.

But I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, to discuss at any considerable length the bill now before us, but I propose to discuss in the time at my disposal some of the issues of the coming campaign.

The two great national political parties, each in the midst of storm and stress and contention, have nominated their candidates for the highest office in the gift of the American people. Both of the men nominated are of high character and honest purpose. Neither of them would, if elected, willfully or intentionally do anything or countenance the doing of anything which he did not believe was for the best interest of all our people. Either could be depended upon to so perform the duties of his high office as to safeguard the liberties of the people, and neither would do anything which he believed would directly or remotely change the fundamental character of our political institutions. Mr. Taft and Mr. Wilson are good and able men of wide learning. Both are progressive; neither is revolutionary.

Having said this much of qualities which these two men possess in common, we have reached the point where their marked differences of temperament, of experience, and of political and economic philosophy become apparent. President Taft is a man of the widest and most varied experience. He has been referred to by high authority as the best equipped man ever elected to the Presidency. To great natural ability and broad educational training was added years of experience as a Federal judge, before whose court came some of the most important cases in our legal history, cases involving the fundamental principles of the rights of labor, issues challenging the acts of great combinations of capital, serious problems, of receiverships of railway systems forced into bankruptcy in the dark days of Democratic administration. Judge Taft, blazing the way, upheld the rights of labor, dissolved illegal combinations of capital, and wisely performed his duty in connection with the rehabilitation of the shattered arteries of commerce.

Called to other responsibilities, he proved himself a splendid administrator in the Philippines and an able diplomat and mediator in many difficult situations. His administration of the War Department was in keeping with the splendid record he had made in other fields. In view of all this it was not strange that a President, who generally displayed excellent judgment in calling strong men into his councils, should have approved him as his successor in terms of almost extravagant commendation and praise. Three and a half years as Chief Executive of the Nation has revealed the President to the American people as the broad-minded widely sympathetic man that he is, free from all bias and prejudice; in active sympathy with, and having a fellow feeling for all classes and conditions of his fellow citizens without regard to race, belief, or condition.

President Taft has not had the knack of appealing, as some others have, to the popular fancy, but he is acknowledged by all to hold the perpetuity of our Government and the welfare of the people above all personal ambition. In the past year a condition has existed on our southern border in Mexico, and recently in Cuba, that might well tempt an ambitious man or even an impulsive one to have taken action which would have plunged the country into war with all its evils, its enormous waste of the people's money, and wanton sacrifice of precious lives. But through it all the President has so guided our affairs as to protect our citizens, preserve the national honor, maintain the respect and confidence of our neighbors and of the world, and save the people from the horrors of bloody conflicts. How different the story might have been, approaching presidential nominations and elections, under a less wise, unselfish, and patriotic leadership.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE.

When we turn to the Democratic candidate we see a man whose life has been spent, in the main, among books. We find him displaying to a marked degree that curious lack of appreciation of the actual struggles and problems of the average man, coupled with a cocksureness of opinion relative to practical problems to which he is an absolute stranger, which often characterizes men whose lives are thus spent. Of learning, such as the books give, he has a plenty; of practical experience with the real basic problems of mankind, industrial and political, precious little. He writes well, speaks with fluency, and hence, has written and spoken much; and much it would have been well for his presidential aspirations had he not spoken or written; and yet these utterances before they became tinctured with presidential aspirations, revealed the true spirit of the man. He was a Virginia-born Democrat of the old school, having no sympathy with and little tolerance for either the doctrines or leaderships which new problems and advancing movements in the country developed. His expression of the hope "that some way could be found to knock Mr. Bryan into a cocked hat" like his disapproval of the initiative and referendum and other plans for giving the people a more effective and direct voice and control in the selection of candidates and the enactment of legislation on the ground that "our Government is most safe when least democratic," were characteristic of the man at a time when he felt free to express his real sentiments.

DR. WILSON ON UNION LABOR.

No true friend of labor can read with approval the sentiments which Dr. Wilson expressed in an address at Princeton in June, 1909, as follows:

> You know what the usual standard of the employee is in our day. It is to give as little as he may for his wages. Labor is standardized by the trades-union, and this is the standard to which it is made to conform. No one is suffered to do more than the average workman can do. In some trades and handicrafts no one is suffered to do more than the least skillful of his fellows can do within the hours allotted to a day's labor, and no one may work out of hours at all or volunteer anything beyond the minimum. I need not point out how economically disastrous such a regulation of labor is.
> It is so unprofitable to the employer that in some trades it will presently not be worth his while to attempt anything at all. He had better stop altogether than operate at an evitable and invariable loss. The labor of America is rapidly becoming unprofitable under its present regulation by those who have determined to reduce it to a minimum.
> Our economic supremacy may be lost because the country grows more and more full of unprofitable servants.

Is a man qualified for the great office of the Presidency who holds such an opinion of American labor and of the effect of labor unions? Is he qualified for any position in public life, and how can any friend of labor or unionism support such a man?

HIS VIEW OF IMMIGRANTS.

Several years ago Mr. Wilson wrote what he was pleased to call a "History of the American people." On pages 212 and 213 of volume 5 he makes some observations in regard to immigration and immigrants as follows:

> The census of 1890 showed the population of the country increased to 62,622,250, an addition of 12,466,467 within the decade. Immigrants poured steadily in as before, but with an alteration of stock which students of affairs marked with uneasiness. Throughout the country men of the sturdy stock of the north of Europe had made up the main strain of foreign blood, which was every year added to the vital working force of the country, or else of the Latin-Gallic stocks of France and northern Italy; but now there comes multitudes of men of the lowest class from the south of Italy and men of a meaner sort out of Hungary and Poland, men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence; and they came in numbers which increased from year to year, as if the countries from the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population, whose standards of life and of work were such as American workmen had never dreamed of hitherto. The people of the Pacific coast have clamored these many years against the admission of immigrants out of China, and in May, 1892, got at last what they wanted, a Federal statute which practically excluded from the United States all Chinese who had not already acquired the right of residence, and yet the Chinese were more to be desired as workmen, if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports. They had, no doubt, many an unsavory habit, bred in unwholesome squalor in the crowded quarters where they most abounded in the western seaports, and seemed separated by their very nature from the people among whom they had come to live; but it was their skill, their intelligence, their hardy power of labor, their knack of succeeding and driving their duller rivals out, rather than their alien habits, that made them feared and hated and led to their exclusion at the prayer of the men they were likely to displace should they multiply. The unlikely fellows who came in at the eastern ports were tolerated because they usurped no place but the very lowest in the scale of labor.

HE PREFERS CHINESE TO EUROPEANS.

What do the people who have come to us from Poland and Hungary and southern Italy and all south and southwest Europe think of a man holding such views as these as a candidate for the highest office in the land? What does any thoughtful citizen think of one so woefully lacking in appreciation of the fundamental requisites for useful citizenship in a free Republic?

Dr. Wilson assails the people from Poland, "the fair land of Poland," which gave us in our struggle for independence the brave and dashing Pulaski, whose gallant figure adorns the splendid avenue leading from this Capitol, and many other brave soldiers; Poland with her marvelous and soul-stirring history of brave struggles for freedom and the rights of man. Dr. Wilson scorns the people from Hungary; brave, picturesque, romantic Hungary, which contributed to our Revolutionary struggle the able and heroic Kosciusko, whose noble monument holds an honored place in front of the presidential mansion, to which Dr. Wilson aspires; Hungary, whose people unaided turned back the tide of Moslem invasion and saved Christian Europe from the awful domination of the unspeakable Turk. Italy, Greece, Servia, Austria, glorious in history, exalted in aspiration, holding the faith of the true God and acknowledging responsibility to Him, all these and others like them are, in the opinion of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, less desirable as citizens of this Republic than the pagan Chinese.

THE PLATFORMS.

Passing from the candidates to the platforms of the two parties and viewing these platforms in the light of our recent legislative experience, we find an even wider difference than that shown by the candidates themselves. Our Democratic friends have in this campaign announced their choice of a battle ground, and fortunately for the Republicans the gauge of battle is thrown down in a field in which our party has been uniformly victorious, once the situation was clearly outlined before the people. The issue could not have been more clearly defined. The Republican Party reaffirms its belief in a protective tariff, and holds that import duties should be high enough, while yielding a sufficient revenue, to protect adequately American industries and wages, and to the end that tariffs may be wisely adjusted along these lines the party declares that it is favorable to securing, through a tariff board or otherwise, the information requisite for intelligent tariff legislation. A declaration in keeping with the fundamental and time-honored principles of the party and yet progressive in the highest degree in its declaration for scientific schedules based on the most complete information.

On the other hand, the Democratic Party in its tariff declaration harks back to the nullification doctrines of Calhoun and to the principles enunciated in the constitution of the late Confederacy. Calhoun proposed to nullify a protective law passed by Congress on the theory that Congress had no right or authority to pass such a law. If old Andrew Jackson were alive now and still a Democrat, instead of threatening to hang Calhoun higher than Hamen he would have to apologize to him, for the party that still claims to be the party of Jackson at Baltimore the other day declared it to be—

A fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no right or power to impose or collect tariff taxes except for the purpose of revenue.

But although the Democracy harks back to nullification days for its tariff policy it can lay claim to a more recent indorsement of it, for we find that the constitution of the late Confederacy was also true to Calhoun's doctrine and declared—nor shall any duties nor taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry—from all of which it would seem that the principle they now announce has good Democratic authority behind it.

The issue is thus fairly joined between Republican protection and Democratic free trade, for there is no difference, so far as the effect on industries is concerned, between a tariff for revenue and free trade. Both mean that the necessary revenue shall be obtained in such way as will not encourage or promote industries by protecting them.

TARIFF AN ISSUE.

There are many reasons why the tariff issue is one that will not down so long as any party in this country challenges the correctness of the policy of protection, for, after all is said and done, the most persistent and insistent issue in this world revolves around the questions of what we shall eat and drink and wherewithal we shall be clothed. There are many questions of method and procedure in government which, while important, the people will temporarily put aside in the presence of an attack upon the sources and the foundation of their opportunities for a livelihood, and that is exactly the situation which now confronts us. There need be no lack of interest in the questions of methods and procedure in our Government which have so largely occupied the public mind for the last three or four years, but the people will not allow them to obscure or displace the issue of prosperity.

Not only does the Democratic platform stand for free trade, but the Democratic candidate has always been a free trader rather from theory than from knowledge, as was curiously illustrated on one occasion when he appeared before a tariff board. He contended that we could compete with foreign countries in wages without protection "just as we do in regard to agricultural products," which, he said, came in free. Having had his attention called to the fact that there was a duty on agricultural products, amounting in the case of wheat to 20 cents a bushel, he said, "then I was misinformed"; but he went right on with his argument just the same. Facts are never allowed to interfere with the theories of a free trader. We have many statements of his, made at one time and another on the subject, and to complete the picture we have a Democratic leadership in Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, avowedly free trade, apologizing for bringing legislation into the House because it contained some little ray of protective legislation, and explaining that nothing of the kind would be allowed to occur unless the revenue which the slightly protective duty raised were needed.

DEMOCRATIC TARIFF LEGISLATION.

We have witnessed the procession through the House in the last year of five Democratic tariff bills. Nothing has pleased the authors of these bills so much as their failure to become laws. Were they now all on the statute books their calamitous effect upon the industries and the welfare of the people would have destroyed every ray or vestige of hope of the Democratic Party for success this fall. If it were not for the awful responsibility involved in bringing disaster upon the people, the Republicans might have been tempted to allow these bills to become laws as an object lesson of the destructive character of Democratic tariff legislation.

Each one of these bills would in turn have destroyed great industries and impoverished multitudes of people. The free sugar bill would have impoverished the farmers and manufacturers alike, in the beet and cane districts of the country, and would have bankrupted the Treasury. The House wool bill would have been a death blow to the great American wool and woolen industries, while the cotton, the chemical, the steel, and the so-called free-list bills would have each furnished its quota of bankruptcy, idleness, hunger, and despair. Together they would have created a condition as disastrous as that which existed under the Wilson bill; and all this loss and poverty and ruin would have had no recompense in better conditions for any class of American citizens except loan sharks and auctioneers.

What makes me confident that the people will rise in defense of the Republican Party and protection and prosperity is the fact that in the midst of these threats, bluffs, and fourflushings by the Democratic Party the industries of the country have continued reasonably prosperous and labor quite steadily employed. It must be because the people realize that they propose to smite the free-trade policy when they get a chance this fall.

We realize that some schedules are unnecessarily high, and our party stands pledged to a reasonable reduction of such schedules. That the schedules of the present tariff are, however, in the main, low compared with former tariffs is abundantly demonstrated by the figures of imports. All sorts of lies were told about the Payne tariff bill when it passed. Never in the history of the country was there so much misstatement and downright lying about a tariff bill as there was about the Payne bill, and unfortunately the people largely believed them.

PAYNE TARIFF LAW.

We have passed from the day of prophecy and prevarication to the time when we have the actual facts and figures about the Payne bill. They show on the basis of imports of merchandise during the 34 months that the Payne tariff law had been in operation down to May 31, 1912, the following results compared with the operation of the Wilson Democratic and Dingley Republican tariffs, respectively: First, that the free list under the Payne law—that is, the amount of goods imported without paying any duty—was a considerably larger percentage of the total of importations than under either the Wilson or the Dingley bills; second, that the average amount of duties paid per dollar of dutiable imports was very considerably lower under the Payne bill than under the other two laws; and that the same was true with regard to the entire volume of our importations. It sometimes takes the truth a long time to catch up with a lie well told and persistently reiterated, and it never can undo the harm the lie has accomplished, but the facts I have stated, taken from the record, give the lie direct to perhaps the most persistent falsehoods ever uttered in American political history. Not only was the Payne bill a revision downward of the Dingley law, but its average rates are demonstrated by the table which I shall place in the RECORD to be lower than those of the Wilson bill of mournful memory. Was a Republican President far from right in saying that the Payne tariff law was the best we ever had, in view of the fact that, with a larger free list than the Wilson law, with lower average ad valorem rates than that law, both as to the dutiable list alone and as to all imports, it has produced an abundance of revenue, placed a surplus in the Treasury, and promoted prosperity in the face of persistent agitation and calamity howling, while under the Wilson bill the Treasury was empty, industry was paralyzed, and the people were in despair. I can imagine no more striking comparison between Democratic and Republican legislation than this, between a crude unbalanced Democratic law which did not produce sufficient public revenue and did paralyze private industry, and a carefully drawn Republican bill with lower average rates, which does produce abundant revenue and at the same time promotes the prosperity of the people. The following is the table I have referred to:

Imports of merchandise into the United States, showing percentage thereof free of duty, customs receipts, and average ad valorem rate of duty during the 34 months' operation of the Payne tariff law, Aug. 5, 1909, to May 31, 1912, compared with like results under the entire operation of the Wilson and Dingley tariffs, respectively.

NOTE.—A reduction of about $55,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the McKinley Act, due to reduced imports in the closing months under that act in anticipation of the passage of the Wilson tariff, whose revenues were correspondingly increased. Likewise a reduction of about $45,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the Dingley Act, due to heavy imports in the closing months under the Wilson law, whose revenues were correspondingly increased.

THE TARIFF ISSUE IN WYOMING.

The people whom I have the honor to represent, though they are not a manufacturing people, are as dependent on a protective tariff for the prosperity of their industries as any people under the flag. We have approximately a tenth of all of the sheep in the Union. Not only are a large number of our people directly interested in the industry, but a still larger number are directly and indirectly benefited by the millions of dollars of annual expenditure in the industry. The dependence of our wool industry upon the tariff is so well known and understood, so universally acknowledged, even by those who do not favor a protective tariff, as to make argument on the subject superfluous. We have a great cattle industry protected, on the one hand, from importations of cheap cattle from Mexico and, on the other hand, from meats from Australia and the Argentine.

The farmers along our northern border are vehement in their opposition to Canadian reciprocity, on the ground that it would bring them into competition with the cheap products of Canada. We share in that opposition, but Wyoming would suffer infinitely more under free trade in coal than she would from Canadian reciprocity, which did not propose free coal. Several of our great coal mines must find a large part of the market for their products in competition with Canadian coals of as good or better quality, more cheaply mined, and with a shorter and cheaper freight haul. It has been estimated that free trade in coal would result in our losing a third of our present market, with its consequent disastrous effect upon the industry and wages.

We have in various parts of Wyoming, notably in the Big Horn Basin, the Wind River Valley, Sheridan and Johnson Counties, and on the Platt and its tributaries, large areas of land suitable for the growth of sugar beets. After years of waiting for transportation facilities, for the completion of reclamation enterprises, and after thorough experimentation and practical demonstration in the growing of beets, we had finally reached the time when, but for Democratic agitation of the sugar tariff, our hope of the establishment of sugar factories was about to be realized. Speaking with knowledge of the situation, I can say with assurance that but for the Democratic free-sugar bill this year at least two beet-sugar factories would have been under way in Wyoming at this time. With the election of a Republican President and Congress there is no reason why Wyoming should not have as many beet-sugar factories as Colorado, which has 17, in the next five years. Elect a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President and our hope of sugar-beet factories goes glimmering forever.

Wyoming is becoming a great alfalfa State, and this great staple product depends for its market upon the great live-stock business, and so the success of the alfalfa farms and ranches is in a large measure dependent upon the protective policy.

Flax is destined to become one of our staple products; the Democratic Party proposes to put flaxseed, which now has a protection of 25 cents a bushel, on the free list. Potato culture, in a large way for the eastern market, presents a promising and profitable field for the enlargement of our agricultural output on both our irrigated and dry lands. Democratic free trade proposes to deprive us of the protection without which our eastern markets can be flooded with foreign potatoes, paying only a low water freight rate.

The railroads of the State, so far as their local business is concerned, can not be prosperous without the prosperity of these local industries which depend upon protection. Even our through railroad business is largely in products of the coast to the East and in manufacture from the East to the West which would be displaced by foreign products and manufactures under free trade; therefore the men on the railroads of the State are as much interested as any class of our people in the continuation of protection.

TRUE ECONOMY.

Our Government makes larger annual expenditures than any National Government in the world; it is also the most honestly administered Government in the world, and our people do not begrudge the vast annual outlay made by the Government for their protection and benefit, so long as it is honestly and economically expended. There is, however, a tendency toward unnecessary expenditure which must be constantly guarded against. With President Roosevelt's liberal views of the legitimate and useful fields of national activity and his intolerance of delay in carrying out any work or enterprise he believed should be undertaken, he could not have been expected to promote or practice economy in national outlay. In fact expenditures increased so rapidly during his administration that ordinary outlay finally outran ordinary income to the amount of over $65,000,000 in the last two years of his administration. This condition inherited by President Taft laid upon him the hard and thankless task of holding down constantly mounting appropriations without crippling or hampering the really useful and helpful expenditures of the Government.

He took hold of the matter with judgment and determination and to such good purpose that while the ordinary outlay of the Government under President Roosevelt had increased $41,000,000 in the fiscal year 1909 over the expenditures in 1908, the expenditures in 1910, the first full year of President Taft's administration, was over three millions less than the year previous, and though the country is growing rapidly and the demand for national expenditures have constantly increased, our ordinary national outlay for each of the fiscal years 1911 and 1912 has been kept below that of 1909 by several million dollars.

Not only this, but the much abused Payne tariff law has proven such a good revenue producer that our ordinary revenues were in the fiscal year 1912 over $90,000,000 more than under the Dingley law in 1909. In 1909 the ordinary receipts were more than fifty-eight millions less than the ordinary disbursements. In 1912 our ordinary income was over $37,000,000 more than our ordinary outlay. This is a record of real economy without injury to the public service.

FALSE ECONOMY.

This Democratic House of Representatives has given us a brilliant example of fake economy. Starting out with a widely advertised plan to economize in the administration of the House, the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have promoted a series of largely useless and unnecessary investigations which have, and will, cost more than all the much advertised economies saved.

At various times during the discussion of appropriation bills I have called to the attention of the House the farce comedy you gentlemen are treating the country to in connection with appropriations. By your own confessions, in many large and important items, you are only appropriating for 8 months instead of 12. You have provided for practically no new projects or expenditures, and in many cases have turned down estimates made by the Government departments for needed repairs and replacements.

Your Army bill prohibited any expenditures for necessary repairs and improvements to our western Army posts. The sundry civil bill did not provide adequately for the ordinary necessary care of public buildings. You turned a deaf ear to our urgent demand for sufficient money to make necessary surveys of public lands, and denied the request of the Forest Service for sufficient sums to build roads and bridges and trails in the forest reserves. All this was done in the name of economy, and yet you appropriated millions for wholly useless and valueless fortifications on the Panama Canal.

Fortunately the Appropriation Committee at the other end of the Capitol has taken a different view of the needs of the public service, and your policy has driven Members of the House to appeal to the Senate for consideration of items of appropriation essential for the Government service and to meet the just obligations of the Nation. I realize that this fake showing of economy is considered necessary to the success of the Democratic ticket in the coming campaign, but I doubt if it will be effective. The people of the country are neither blind nor foolish.

I do not think the gentlemen on the other side are very proud of, or happy over, the results of the numberless investigations that have been instituted and carried on. No wicked or idle tale prompted by self-interest, envy, or malice, has been too remote from the jurisdiction of the investigation committees, or too frivolous to escape investigation, and yet how miserably meager the harvest of results has been. I said I did not think our Democratic friends were proud or happy over the results of these investigations, and yet, as patriotic citizens, they should be, for they have proven, as perhaps no other means could have done, how free from wrong-doing and how little subject to criticism the administration of the vast volume of our public affairs has been under a party that has been in control of all branches of the Government for 15 years. That ought to be a matter of pride to any American citizen.

PARTY ACHIEVEMENT.

The Republican Party to-day, as always, points with pride to its record of achievement and looks forward with hope and confidence to the future. As has been well stated in our platform:

The Republican Party looks back upon its record with pride and satisfaction, and forward to its new responsibilities with hope and confidence. Its achievements in government constitute the most luminous pages in our history. Our greatest national advance has been made during the years of its ascendancy in public affairs. It has been genuinely and always a party of progress; it has never been either stationary or reactionary; it has gone from the fulfillment of one great pledge to the fulfillment of another in response to the public need and to the popular will.

Referring first to our latest party achievements under the present administration, we can point with pride to the establishment of postal-savings banks; of the Bureau of Mines, which has been so useful and helpful to our miners; to the Children's Bureau; to the legislation for the suppressing of the white-slave traffic; to the enactment and enforcement of the pure-food law; to the increase of pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Civil War; to the bringing into the Union of the Commonwealths of Arizona and New Mexico.

In that class of legislation which so vitally affects the citizen in his rights and property under present industrial conditions—legislation to control great combinations of capital and to prevent monopoly and restraint of trade, and legislation regulating railways and other means of transportation—the party has been faithful, wise, and progressive. All of the laws for the suppression of monopoly and for the control of railways have been placed upon the statute books by Republicans, and generally in the face of Democratic opposition. The antitrust act of 1890; the interstate-commerce act of 1887 and its important amendments, giving ample powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission; the so-called 16-hour law, limiting the hours of employment of those engaged in train service; the prohibition of free passes, all are Republican legislation enforced by a Republican Executive.

COMBINATIONS OF CAPITAL.

The antitrust act of 1890 remained a dead letter under the Democratic Cleveland administration except for its enforcement against a labor organization. The McKinley administration was the first to energetically enforce the statute, and prosecutions were continued under Roosevelt; but it remained for the present administration to make the statute a vital force in the breaking up and prevention of monopoly. The decisions in the Tobacco and Standard Oil cases, the prosecution of the Beef Trust, the pending suits against the Steel and Harvester Trusts, have finally put the terror of the law in the hearts of trust magnates.

Possibly it is not to be wondered at that in their wrath and resentment against the administration which is making them answer for their crimes against the American people, the men at the head of these trusts, like Mr. Perkins, should be giving their millions and their influence to a movement through which they hope to defeat President Taft for reelection. Certain false friends of the people have sought to detract from the credit due the administration for its trust prosecutions by claiming that the outcome of these successful suits would not be effective in the suppression of monopoly. The rage of the trust magnates, their flocking to the standard of a proposed new party, their millions contributed to defeat Taft and wreck the Republican Party, are the best answers to such a claim.

In Wyoming we happen to know of the potent and beneficial effect of the Standard Oil decision. Every man interested in the development of the great oil resources of our State can tell of the changed conditions since the Standard Oil decision. It is as though an atmosphere charged with storm, laden with threatenings, and burdened with gloom had been suddenly, as by magic, cleared and purified; no longer the haunting fears of a subtle power liable to manifest itself in any one or all of a hundred ways to baffle, thwart, and defeat effort and endeavor, but a universally recognized opportunity to develop and do business. And yet there are sinister influences in the name of virtue and under the guise of reform which would rob the people of the victories they have won under this republican administration.

TAFT THE ANTITRUST CANDIDATE.

Leaving out of consideration our friends the Socialists and the Prohibitionists, who base their campaigns on other issues, the only candidate who will be before the American people this fall who is entirely free from all association or alliance, direct or indirect, with the trusts is William Howard Taft. We all recall how Prof. Wilson's candidacy for the Presidency was launched. George Harvey, of Harper's Weekly, friend and confidant of J. Pierpont Morgan, brought him out and widely advertised his candidacy. It is true that after Prof. Wilson had profited mightily by Harvey's support he displayed the basest ingratitude toward him and declined his further open support, but that does not alter the fact that great trust magnates like the Belmonts and Ryans are supporting the Democratic candidate.

Mr. Bryan's sensational desertion of CHAMP CLARK, who was the people's candidate, in the Baltimore convention and his support of Mr. Wilson has had the effect of making the people temporarily forget the origin and source of Mr. Wilson's real strength. It is, and always has been, largely among the friends, sympathizers, and supporters of the great financial magnates of the country. Tammany did not vote for Wilson, because Tammany is wise in not showing its hand; but all of the elements in New York that are for Wilson most heartily, Tammany included, are in sympathy with the objects and purposes of those controlling great trusts.

THE THIRD PARTY AND THE TRUSTS.

The close commune between the third-term party candidate and the third-term party organization and the trusts is so notorious as to make extended argument or elaboration superfluous. Mr. Perkins, late partner of J. Pierpont Morgan, who wants the Federal Government to issue licenses to the trusts to plunder the people, and others like him, have from the beginning been the promoters, supporters, and underwriters of the third-term party movement. The Steel and Harvester Trusts particularly are so notoriously supporting the thirty-term party movement, and the movement is so universally acknowledged to have an abundance of funds from these sources at its command that further comment is unnecessary.

PRESIDENT TAFT AND THE TRUSTS.

The Republican Party, under President Taft, could have no alliance or affiliation with great trusts or combinations of capital, seeking to unlawfully restrain trade and create and establish monopolies, if it wanted to, and they certainly do not want to. The administration of President Taft has so continuously, forcefully, and successfully prosecuted combinations of capital in restraint of trade that in their fury they rush to the support of the Democratic nominee or the third-term party candidate, whichever seems to them to hold out the best promise of defeating the Republican Party and President Taft. Every resource of money and influence will be used directly and indirectly to defeat the President for reelection, and it is difficult at this time to say in which direction the greatest efforts will be made to accomplish this purpose, whether through the Democratic or the third-term party.

It ought to be clear to the dullest understanding that the only hope of the people in their battle for the suppression of monopoly is in the support of the party and the candidate which has been and is at this time vigorously enforcing the law against illegal combinations. It ought to be equally clear that the Democratic candidate and party are not and can not be clear from alliances with great corporate wealth, and certainly no one can be so poorly informed as not to know that the third-term candidate and his organization has as its principal prop and support the officers, the beneficiaries, and the friends of great trusts and combinations seeking to monopolize the industries of the country.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS.

The Interstate Commerce Commission was established by the Republican Party in 1887. It was strengthened and made a really vital force by successive amendments developed in the school of experience, but it never really found itself and became the vital efficient force for good it was intended to be until the present administration. No administrative bureau ever erected has so universally commended itself to public sentiment as the Interstate Commerce Commission under the administration of William Howard Taft.

It has been impossible, in view of the magnitude of the problem, for the commission to give attention to and adjust all of the manifold problems arising in connection with our enormous system of interstate transportation, but it has passed upon and wisely adjusted many of the larger and controlling problems. It stood like a wall of adamant against a demand by all of the railways for a general increase of rates. It has cured and prepared the way for the further curing of oppressive rates affecting vast tonnages in the intermountain and western States by the decisions in the so-called Spokane case, the Salt Lake case, and the cases affecting wool rates. The recent order of the commission reducing express rates from 15 to 50 per cent will be of great and lasting benefit to the people, and is only the beginning of the regulation and reduction of express rates.

THE MEAT PACKERS.

One of the important problems in this connection is that of bringing the retail price which the people must pay for meats in reasonable harmony with the price which the stock grower receives for his product. The cost of meat production, owing to the breaking up of the ranges into farms and the better price which the farmer receives and should receive for corn and hay, has largely increased. Yet there is a well-founded belief that the great packers so manipulate the prices they pay for live stock and charge for meat as to secure an inordinate profit at both ends of their business. The peculiar practices and methods of the packers have made it exceedingly difficult for the Government to prove to the satisfaction of a jury that the packers have been guilty of violating the criminal provisions of the antitrust laws.

The packers, like some other large combinations, in view of the known determination of the administration to put an end to their monopolistic practices, have in contemplation dissolution of the great holding combination known as the National Packing Co., and there is hope, if the people do not unwisely desert the administration which has fought their battles, for permanent relief from the exactions of the great packers.

The facts that President Taft's administration has developed and the reforms it has accomplished in reducing the powers of the packers are an illuminating commentary on that famous report made by former Commissioner of Corporations and Secretary of the Interior Garfield, under President Roosevelt, to his chief, in which he consumed several months of time, spent a large amount of Government money, and spoiled several hundred pages of good white paper in a labored effort to prove that the packers were a much-abused band of philanthropists, working overtime for the benefit of the people and getting only a measly 3½ per cent on their investment for their trouble.

Mr. Garfield, like his successor as Chief of the Bureau of Corporations, Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, appointed by Mr. Roosevelt, who likewise gave Mr. Perkins's Harvester Trust a good name and a clean bill of health to his chief, is now and has been one of the supporters of the third-party movement. These two patriots can not tolerate a party and an administration which is so inconsidcrate as to prosecute the trusts they particularly favor.

THE MEAT PROBLEM.

It is my opinion that we shall not reach a really satisfactory condition in regard to our meat supply until, by the more general distribution of slaughtering establishments, large and small, we shall insure more real competition in the purchase of sheep and cattle for slaughter, and hence a better price to the stock raiser. Such a policy, by bringing the producer of meats nearer the consumer and preventing monopoly, will also give the consumer relief from exorbitant prices.

One obstacle in the way of such a distribution of packing establishments in the past has been the difficulty of securing satisfactory railroad rates. I have already pointed out how, under our efficient Interstate Commerce Commission, reasonable rates can now be secured. The commission now has such complete knowledge of the situation as will render speedy adjustment of other unfair and unjust rates possible and certain, and yet all has been done and will be done for the relief of the people, in full recognition of the rights of the common carriers to fair compensation, to the end that investments in railroads shall not be jeopardized or discouraged and that the roads may be able to pay liberal compensation to their employees.

THE PARTY OF PROGRESS.

The Republican Party has always been and is to-day the party of real and not sham progress and progressiveness—ever alert and responsive to the necessity and demand for progressive legislation which shall apply the principles of justice, equity, and righteousness to the constantly changing problems confronting a mighty people under a free government. We recognize that great as the achievements of the past have been, there always will be new problems, to be met in the spirit of fairness and to be settled in accordance with the principles of justice in the interest of all the people.

We are pledged to an unceasing warfare against monopoly and privilege and to such additional legislation as may be necessary to make clear the line of demarcation between the opportunities for the fair rewards, due real service rendered by individuals or corporations, and the practices which seek the amassing of great fortunes through methods of industrial piracy and monopoly.

We stand pledged to a supreme effort along all lines to reduce, as far as possible, the gap between the fair prices and rewards to which the producer on the farm, or the ranch, and in the workshop receives for the product of his labor, his genius, and his energy, and the price which the ultimate consumer must pay for these products. We stand pledged to legislation calculated to increase the attractiveness and the rewards of life upon the farms and ranches of the Nation. That life which has and always will develop the highest and best class of citizenship; those industries upon which the feeding and the clothing of the Nation primarily depend. To this end we favor the establishment of a parcel post which shall be just to all; the encouragement of better agricultural loan facilities; the betterment of conditions of inland transportation.

IN THE INTEREST OF LABOR.

We stand as we always have stood, pledged and dedicated to the highest and best interests of labor; to a protective tariff which will maintain the American wage rate and the American standard of living. We favor legislation which will lift from the shoulders of widows and orphans, so far as financial compensation can do it, the want and misery entailed by the loss or injury in industrial pursuits of their natural supporters and protectors.

It is intolerable to the sense of justice that the burdens of the inevitable casualties connected with industries, beneficial to all of the people, should be laid upon the bereaved and helpless. To be truly helpful the response and compensation should be swift, certain, and adequate.

To all good citizens it is axiomatic that those engaged in labor, like all classes of our citizens, should be established, confirmed, and protected in all their rights. I always have and always will favor and support legislation to accomplish that purpose. My youth and early manhood was spent among and sharing the burdens of those who toil. I have felt the pinch and grip of poverty, and I have also felt the wholesome satisfaction that comes from a hard day's work honestly performed. I could not be lacking in knowledge of and sympathy with the problems and aspirations of labor unless I forgot my own experience. I could not fail to appreciate and proclaim the honor and dignity of labor without surrendering the just pride I have in my own record.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE WEST.

In the face of a prejudiced and misguided sentiment, fostered largely by men with selfish personal ambitions, it has not been possible to secure all of the legislation needed for the speedy settlement and orderly development of the public domain; but the Republican Party, author of the homestead policy, has, as an organization, been true to its historic policy, and much has been accomplished in the face of difficulties. Following the national reclamation law has come the enlarged homestead act and the act for the agricultural entry of coal land. Quite recently the three-year homestead law was enacted. Thanks to earnest and determined effort, this law was secured free from the limitations which the extreme conservationists would have put upon it, and carrying the highly beneficial provision for an annual leave of absence. These and a number of minor but helpful provisions of law have marked the progress of the orderly evolution of the Republican homestead policy.

The opposition of certain extremists, now largely marshaling themselves under a third party banner, has prevented other needed legislation to make possible the more advantageous use and development, in the interest of all of the people and without monopoly, of some of our mineral resources and of those portions of the public domain which are more suitable for grazing than for farming. But with the triumph of the Republican Party and its freedom from certain influences which now seem to be seeking their purposes through another organization, we may confidently hope and expect additional legislation and such reasonable administration as will relieve the West from the handicap of those policies which, under the false claim of serving the people, have been oppressive in their effect upon individuals honestly seeking homes and opportunities on the public domain and retarding in their effect upon general development.

THIRD PARTY MOVEMENT.

The Republican Party for the third time in its history is confronted with a serious defection in its ranks. Those who are old enough will remember the abuse heaped upon the immortal Lincoln by members of his own party when he was a candidate for reelection. They will recall now the reelection of the great emancipator, which we now know to have been essential to the integrity and prosperity of the Nation, was for months after his nomination despaired of. The differences then developed led to the nomination of Horace Greeley by the Liberal Republicans in 1872; and up to within a month of the date of election that movement gave every promise of sweeping the country and defeating Grant. It is not so far back to the Silver Republican bolt of 1896, when those who adhered to the party and particularly in the West, were denounced as hirelings of Wall Street and enemies of mankind; and many remember the certain and cocksure predictions up to the very day of election of the defeat of McKinley; and so to-day we are confronted with a breach in the party lines and the promise of an independent nomination.

No citizen under a free government is justified in abusing men for honest differences of political views. Members of any political party have a perfect right, for proper reasons, either to support the candidates of another party, or, if they see fit, ally themselves with a separate and independent organization. On the other hand, all good citizens have a right, and it is their duty, to calmly, dispassionately inquire into the motives which actuate such conduct and to insist upon truth of statement relative thereto and that honesty of purpose and real, and not false or merely fanciful, reasons shall constitute the motive or the excuse for such action.

THE PRECONVENTION CAMPAIGN.

In the campaign preceding the Republican national convention there was a wide difference of opinion, as there generally is, relative to the choice of candidates. Some of the active supporters of a certain candidate frankly admit that for what they were pleased to term "psychological reasons" they instituted a large number of fictitious contests, many of them long after delegates had been elected without opposition, and thereupon presumedly for the same "psychological reasons" started a nation-wide campaign of accusation and abuse, continuing it on down during and subsequent to the national convention in ever-increasing violence and volume.

There was no single note of moderation in all this torrent of abuse and villification. The national committee, containing many friends and supporters of the candidate who had been most emphatic and vehement and abusive in the claim that delegates and delegations had been stolen, by their unanimous vote in a considerable majority of the contests—and in many cases where the claims of fraud had been the most positive, emphatic, and violent—declared against the delegates pledged for him. Even then the charges of fraud were in no particular or in the slightest degree modified or withdrawn; on the contrary, each succeeding unanimous judgment of the national committee against delegates and delegations which had been claimed by and for Mr. Roosevelt but led to a fresh outburst of extravagant claims, astounding charges, and unmeasured abuse.

Evidently somebody was wrong. Either Mr. Roosevelt was mistaken, misled, or carried beyond all bounds by disappointed ambition, or his friends and supporters on the national committee were, after 15 days of examination of contest cases, all misled or were wicked and disloyal to him.

Later, the cases still contested were presented and argued at great length before the committee on credentials of the convention, and a period equal to five eight-hour days was consumed in hearing and consideration of contests. No one was denied a hearing; ample time was allowed. By a majority of more than two-thirds, including, in most cases, the members from States whose delegates were not for either Mr. Taft or Mr. Roosevelt, the committee decided the cases as they had been decided by the national committee.

The fact is, that in cases of doubt, the doubt was generally resolved in favor of delegates pledged to Mr. Roosevelt. Much has been said of the two delegates from the fourth California district. The fact is that under terms of the call for the committee none of the Roosevelt district delegates from California were entitled to seats, and yet they were all seated, except in the district where the Taft delegates had a clear majority.

The Republican Party has always stood for the principle of local representation and can not agree to the doctrine that the people of a district shall be disfranchised in the election of their own representatives by the vote of people living outside the district. If the policy adopted in California should become general, New York City, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other large cities would elect and control all the delegates to national conventions from the States in which they were located. What a snap for bosses such a plan would be is proven by the fact that Boss Johnson absolutely controlled the California delegates.

CONTESTS HONESTLY DECIDED.

Not only were the delegates in the Republican convention at Chicago honestly seated, but the demand that no contested delegate should be allowed to vote on any question was most preposterous. No delegate was allowed to vote on his own case, but if the rule were adopted in conventions that no delegate placed on the temporary roll whose seat was contested was allowed to vote on any question, the flimsiest minority could absolutely control any convention by the simple process of disfranchising the majority by trumped-up eleventh-hour contests.

To fully realize how preposterous the proposition presented was, it should be remembered that it was not proposed to deny all of the 252 delegates whose seats had been contested the right to participate in the convention, or to deny that right to any of the Roosevelt delegates whose seats had been contested by Taft men. The demand was made as to a select list referred to as 92, but really only 72, of Taft delegates who, a self-appointed arbiter had taken it upon himself to judge, were not entitled to seats, though he had not heard a single contest presented or argued. This action reminds one of the case of the hotel keeper who, having presented an exorbitant bill to a departing guest, was interrogated by the guest as to just why he fixed his outrageous charge at the exact figure he did, to which the landlord grimly replied that he had been doing some figuring and had concluded that was exactly the sum he needed in his business.

Unfortunately, many good people have been misled by the cocksureness and vehemence of the charges made against the action at Chicago in the seating of delegates. Such people should recall that the leaders of a movement may originally be misled by the statements of superserviceable and dishonest subordinates on whose suggestions contests have been brought. Once having made declaration, disappointment, the lack of courage to confess an error, or overweening personal ambition will sometimes lead men to almost any length or act or accusation.

Those Republicans who are inclined to follow the third-party movement should ponder long before doing so. While the leader of the movement did not secure delegates enough to place him in nomination, he could have brought about the nomination of any one of half a dozen candidates known as leaders in the so-called progressive movement long before he sought to appropriate to himself the strength of that movement; but he refused to do so or to allow his supporters to do so, insisting that if there was to be a compromise, "the compromise candidate will be me."

THE THIRD TERM.

I can not believe the people will support a third-term candidate. The warning and example of Washington and all the great men of our history are against it. The present aspirant for the third term has, in the most solemn manner, declared against it. Furthermore, I can not imagine how a movement can commend itself which is notoriously financed and fostered by the heads of great trusts which the Government is prosecuting. Self-seeking men will join a movement because of the fact that it has unlimited corporate capital backing it, as we are constantly assured by its friends that the third party has, but it certainly can not appeal on that ground to the ordinary citizen. Mr. Perkins and other great trust magnates are not likely to go into political movements requiring large outlay without expecting a return on their investment in the opportunities to plunder the people. A party long established, with complete organization, may carry on a campaign with a limited amount of contributions, but to build up an entirely new organization is a costly process. The plan of Government regulated and controlled monopolies advocated by Mr. Perkins and other leaders of high finance and approved by Mr. Roosevelt only needs a complaisant administration to make easy the oppression and looting of the public to an extent beyond the dreams of avarice.

Nor can the common people be expected to follow in the lead of rich dilettantes like the Pinchots and the McCormicks who, born to great wealth and the possessors of vast incomes which they find it hard to spend, with no practical knowledge of or real sympathy for the struggles, the trials, and the problems of the plain people, are eager for power that they may exploit their theories and gratify their ambitions at the expense of the public. Add to these the Flinns and the Wards and all the other representatives of the worst types of bossism, masquerading under a false pretense and groping for issues which it is hoped will temporarily mislead the people, and the wonder is that they can secure any considerable following, particularly when to follow the third party only serves to aid the Democratic candidate.

OPPORTUNITY FOR USEFUL SERVICE.

The Republican Party is to-day, as it has always been, big enough to afford an opportunity within its ranks for useful work and earnest and faithful endeavor for men of widely differing views as to the wisest course to pursue to secure the best results in the interests of all of the people in matters of detail of procedure, administration, and legislation. Its glorious history, its marvelous record of achievement, its long line of patriots and statesmen among the wisest, the bravest, and the best in American history, all of these are at one and the same time an inspiration to party loyalty and an assurance that if, forgetting minor differences, we stand shoulder to shoulder for our great principles we shall accomplish as much in the future for the cause of liberty and righteousness and good government as has been accomplished in the past.

The Republican Party is to-day as it always has been the true party of progress. It has, like all organizations composed of mortal men, made mistakes, but it never has as a party been guilty of a fraud or dodged an issue. There have been times in its history when it might have purchased temporary success at the price of abandonment of principle, but as it refused to excuse or temporize with slavery, as it declined to compromise the national credit in the day of greenbackism, as it stood as a wall of defense against the depreciation of the currency in 1896, as it has declined to abandon the doctrine of protection in the hours when it was temporarily unpopular, as it stood for the rights of the black man even at the cost of success in the South, so it stands to-day, determined in its adherence to the fundamental principles of our Government, steadfast for the protection of the rights of all classes of citizens, and firm in its faith and confidence in the wisdom of the ultimate judgment of the people.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this bill is the same as House bill 12812, introduced in the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

That bill was agreed to in conference between the committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and it was finally adopted by both branches and submitted to the President. He promptly vetoed it, and his veto was sustained.

At that time the report from the Tariff Board had not been received. The Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee prepared their former bill without holding any hearings for the purpose of obtaining any information from either the manufacturers of cotton goods or the operatives employed in this great industry.

This action was in conspicuous contrast with past actions by the Committees on Ways and Means of both the Republican and the Democratic Parties.

When the Wilson bill was prepared, the committee, a majority of whom were Democrats, listened patiently to the testimony of both manufacturers and operatives, who were sent from New England to Washington to give the information which was then eagerly sought for the purpose of submitting a bill which should foster and promote the cotton-manufacturing industry. The result was that a bill was adopted by the Congress which, in so far as it related to the cotton industry, was acceptable to both capital and labor.

Had the Ways and Means Committee of that Congress displayed as much wisdom and common sense in preparing the remaining schedules of the Wilson Tariff Act, and had they also not allowed themselves to become Bryanized, and rushed wildly after the financial heresies accompanying the "free-silver" crusade, the victory of the Republican Party in the campaign of 1896 might never have been written into history. But, true to its past history, the Democratic Party blundered in the preparation of the Wilson Tariff Act, and the result was that mills and all classes of manufactures were unfortunately and vitally affected. Men and women were thrown out of employment, with the usual result that when the wage earner is deprived of his wages his purchasing power is reduced. His inability to obtain the necessities of life immediately affected the farmer in the disposition of the products of his farm, and the result was there was general business depression and disaster.

This showed how interdependent we are. There can be no permanent prosperity where a definite attempt is made to attack any especial industry of such vital importance to both the North and the South as the cotton industry is by so reducing the duties upon manufactured products that, in addition to the competition between manufacturers in this country, these manufacturers and their employees shall be subject to the competition of foreign manufacturers and foreign labor. A careful investigation would have disclosed the fact that domestic competition so reduces the price of the manufacture of cotton goods that the profits, except in rare cases, are very limited.

The added competition of the foreign manufacturer which this bill will cetrainly produce would only result in a reduction of the price of the product below the necessary profit required to keep the cotton mills running, and if this foreign competition continued, as it certainly would, the inevitable result would be a reduction in the cost of production at home. If that reduction in cost of manufacture necessitates a reduction of wages and the stopping of mills, it would disastrously affect the wageworker and his family by depriving him of employment.

I fail to understand the wisdom or logic which takes possession of the Democratic majority and leads them to promote legislation of the character written into this bill when past experience has shown that it leads to disaster to business interests of great importance and, worse than all, the throwing out of employment thousands of men, women, and children who find work and wages, which means happiness in the home and greater opportunity for the education of the rising generation. I have heretofore referred to the wisdom displayed in the preparation of the cotton schedules of the Wilson Tariff Act in 1894. The Committee on Ways and Means gave patient attention to the testimony of both operatives and manufacturers, and they were induced by the prominent representatives of the Democratic Party in New England to so write the cotton schedule that the industry which was then of so great importance to that section of the United States that even the Democratic leaders then in Congress hesitated and gave such consideration to the facts that had been furnished them that they proceeded to prepare a bill which dealt reasonably fair with both the operative and the manufacturer.

The cotton manufacturing industry in the South was developing largely then by the influx of capital and the furnishing of machinery by machinery builders from the Northern States, and there were no large southern investments in the industry there. Consequently the tariff was virtually prepared throughout through the assistance and advice of the northern operative and manufacturer in the cotton industry.

The election of 1896 restored the Republican Party to power and the Dingley Tariff Act was written into law. Hearings were held and all of the schedules were given careful consideration. Operatives and manufacturers in the cotton industry appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and expressed themselves satisfied with the cotton schedules, and the only changes made in the cotton tariff were a very few, made necessary by changes in the processes of manufacture, and the consequent need of guarding against the competition of the foreign manufacturer. In fact, the tariff, in so far as it related to the cotton industry, was practically unchanged. The general revival of business in every other line of manufacture gave a healthful impetus to the cotton industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have never known of such a scale of wages prevailing as marked the period from March 4, 1857, to March 4, 1861, or of such a long period of lack of employment as marked the history of that memorable Democratic administration.

For the first time since 1861 the cotton manufacturing industry has been singled out for attack by the Democratic majority in the Sixty-second Congress.

There is no other industry in the country which can show as small a margin of profit in a general sense as the cotton industry. That there have been phenomenal cases where conditions in the purchase of raw material, ability in management of the plant, and fortunate conditions have prevailed in disposing of the product at limited periods where the business has been profitable, but those conditions have been the exception and not the inflexible rule. Foreign competition will make the conditions in the United States disastrous to the ordinary manufacturer and injurious to the more successful and prosperous manufacturer.

It has frequently been the experience of the cotton operative that long-continued depression and disastrous conditions to the manufacturer result in a reduction in the wage scale, for that is an element of cost that is most easily attackable when competition becomes so keen that profits are eliminated.

The competition is, and has been, so keen for a long period in the cotton industry in our own country that prices of cloth and yarn, except in particular and especial lines, show but a small margin of profit.

The cotton-goods schedules prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House in the Payne Tariff Act were practically unchanged when that bill was sent from this body to the north end of the Capitol.

In another body it was deemed wise to make many important changes in the bill to meet the changing conditions in the industry and to provide for checkmating and reducing the competition from the fine cotton-goods industry in foreign countries. I listened to the debates that took place at that time, and certainly, from samples of goods shown and facts given as to the construction of the law by appraisers and decisions of the courts, there appeared to me to be ample reason for a more specific and definite tariff to be determined in order that the fine-goods industry in this country might receive more ample and definite protection from the competition of the manufacturers from abroad.

Amendments were offered and were finally considered in a conference between the committees of the two Houses, and the Payne-Aldrich Act was enacted into law.

The principal objections to the cotton schedules of that measure came from the interests of the importers, wholesalers, and the large department stores of the country. The newspapers, on account of dissatisfaction arising from the wood-pulp and print-paper schedules, very largely joined hands with the importing interests in attacks upon the bill. The importers are an important aggregation of business men in New York and other large business centers. They have no interest or sympathy with those who toil for their daily bread, nor are they engaged in promoting or encouraging the manufacturing industries of the United States, because they find their most profitable occupation to discredit the tariff laws of the United States and also to make it easier to bring into our seaports the products of other countries where the wages paid the employees are smaller and the cost of maintenance and fixed charges of the manufacturing plants are less than those of similar establishments in the United States.

These men are alert, sharp, and naturally they endeavor to provide for their own households, and they do not give consideration to American interest preferentially over the interests of the foreigner, and therefore they become powerful allies with the free traders, tariff reformers, and incidentally they naturally gravitate to the Democratic Party in its present efforts to destroy the tariff wall which has for so long a period defended the interests of American industries and American labor. I have read the earnest appeals of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, whose headquarters are at Charlotte, N. C., addressed to the chairman and members of the Committee on Ways and Means asking that they would give heed to their demand that the cotton schedule should not be subject to a radical revision without granting to these important factors in the development of the southern cotton industry an opportunity to appear before the committee and present facts for their consideration. If I am correctly informed this request was denied.

One of the most prominent and successful manufacturers in the district which I have the honor to represent is Mr. Walter H. Langshaw, president and agent of the Dartmouth & Bristol Mills, of New Bedford, Mass., who expressed some criticisms of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act, and it was quite natural that Chairman UNDERWOOD, of the Committee on Ways and Means, should look to him for aid and assistance in destroying the effectiveness of that act.

Mr. Langshaw wrote to Mr. UNDERWOOD during the special session of the Sixty-second Congress expressing his inability to aid in preparing the schedules of the pending bill, because of the complex nature of the work and lack of time to properly prepare for such an important undertaking. Mr. Langshaw further expresses his regret that men connected with the dry goods committee, comprised largely of importers, had been engaged for the purpose of assisting in making a new cotton schedule, and he informed Mr. UNDERWOOD that he would not wish to be identified with men whose interests lie so diametrically opposed to those of investors in this country, and whose statements are the best evidence of their ignorance on the subject. As for a revision by politicians, Mr. Langshaw states he has no patience with that. Mr. Langshaw also further added that he esteemed the time too limited at that session of Congress to do the work justice, and he further stated that he does not want, either directly or indirectly, to be identified with such bungling as has been done in the past or with any action for which political expediency is a dominating factor. This plain language from a successful manufacturer who is in no sense a "standpatter" ought to be carefully considered. Neither Mr. Langshaw nor anyone else was granted a hearing by the Committee on Ways and Means.

I also quote the following interview with Mr. John Hobin, secretary of the textile council of the city of New Bedford, Mass., as taken from the New Bedford Evening Standard of July 26, 1911:

OPERATIVES INTERESTED—FEAR RADICAL REDUCTION IN TARIFF ON COTTONS—NOT OPPOSED, HOWEVER, TO SLIGHT LOWERING OF RATES TO LEVEL OF THE DINGLEY BILL—INCREASES NOT ASKED FOR HAVE PROVED DETRIMENTAL TO THE MILL WORKERS.

That the textile operatives of this city and of other cotton-manufacturing centers strenuously object to the proposed radical reductions in the cotton schedule, although they insist that some reductions should be made, is the opinion of John Hobin, secretary of the textile council of this city. While cotton manufacturers, converters, finishers, importers, and politicians are quarreling over what should be done with the cotton schedule—which was presumably framed to protect the wage earner in American cotton mills—this expression of opinion from a prominent official of the labor men themselves ought to have interest:

"When the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was under discussion," Mr. Hobin said yesterday, "the textile unions joined with the manufacturers in a petition that the cotton schedules be retained at the existing level. That was all they wanted, and, through the delegation that the United Textile Workers sent down to Washington, all they asked. They certainly did not want the duties pushed up higher, as was done. So they are consistent when they ask that the cotton schedules be reduced.

"We feel that the raising of the duties is as injurious to the wage earner as would be a serious reduction in them. By the undue elevation of the duties, the converters and retailers have been permitted to charge prices for the cloth so high as to place them comparatively out of reach of a large part of the consumers. We believe that the retention of the present abnormally high duties can not fail to produce such high prices for cloth as to limit the market and force curtailment in the industry.

"But, on the other hand," Mr. Hobin continued, "we protest against the reduction of duties to the extent proposed by the Democrats. In saying this I am not raising a party issue nor talking from a political standpoint. I believe that the textile operatives as a whole feel the same way, irrespective of politics. We are very much afraid that the party in power at Washington is going to injure us as seriously by reductions in the tariff as the other party did by undue elevations of it.

"Personally, I favor very much President Taft's scheme of submitting this matter to a Tariff Commission. The cotton schedule ought to be capable of scientific adjustment, and in my opinion this is the best solution of the problem."

The pending bill proposes to benefit the consumer by creating greater competition for the American manufacturer by reducing the tariff on imports to such an extent that the American manufacturer will be compelled to lower his cost of production to enable him to meet this new element of competition, if this bill should be enacted into law. As previously stated, there were, in 1910, 1,713 cotton mills, all constructed at high cost of labor, material, and machinery; very much higher in cost than our foreign competitors are called upon to pay. These mills are too costly and are built of too heavy material to be removed from their present locations, even if more favorable locations could be obtained, and these facts ought to receive consideration when new elements of competition are to be suddenly forced upon the investor by the proposed radical reduction of the tariff.

The proposed revision of the tariff affects every one of the 1,713 cotton mills in the United States and every one of the vast number of operatives in the different mills in many States of the Union, but it more directly and unfavorably affects the finer grades of yarns and finer qualities of cotton cloth than any other product of the industry, for the importations have been in the past, and will continue to be in the future, on the finer qualities of production, and the amount of the importations will, in the judgment of every manufacturer and operative whose views I have seen quoted, exceed by manyfold the estimate quoted by the chairman of the committee in presenting the proposed bill.

New Bedford, Mass., is the center of the fine-yarn and fine-goods industry in the United States, and although Fall River, Mass., exceeds it in number of cotton spindles, it ranks second in the production of fine yarns and fine goods. These two great cotton centers will be called upon to bear the greater burden which the reduction of the tariff proposed in this bill will impose upon any community in the United States. I protest against this proposed iniquitous legislation in the name of and in behalf of every man, woman, and child in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Under the existing tariff act the cotton business has been fairly prosperous, and continuous employment has been the rule rather than the exception.

Wages have been increased and the hours of labor have been reduced in the cotton industry in the State which I represent, in part, on this floor. There is a strike in the city of New Bedford, in the district which I have the honor to represent, occasioned by a difference of opinion between the operative and the manufacturer on the question of fining the operatives for imperfect work in the weaving departments. While this difference of opinion on this question is very unfortunate, it is not in any way involved in the tariff problem.

In the first session of the Sixty-second Congress House bill 12812 was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and it was adopted and reported to the House of Representatives by the Democratic majority of said committee. For some reason best known to the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means they did not hold any public hearings on the bill. It was reported to the House and only a very limited time for debate was allowed. The bill was finally passed by the House. It went to the Senate and the bill was agreed to and it was presented to the President for approval or disapproval. It met with the disapproval of the President.

At that time there was no report from the Tariff Board, and the President showed the inconsistencies and fallacies of the bill, which he thought was prepared without due care and consideration and without having possession of facts necessary to the framing of a bill of such vital importance to the many thousands employed in this industry and to the large amount of capital invested in the industry.

After the bill had passed the House it had been sent to the Senate. Southern manufacturers sought there an opportunity to be heard regarding some phases of the industry which vitally affected them, but they were denied the privilege of presenting their views except in a limited manner.

It was not expected that any bill affecting the manufactures of cotton would be presented at this session of Congress. But as the other body began to actively consider other tariff schedules on the floor of the Senate, the Democratic majority of the Committee on Ways and Means determined to report another bill to the House. It was supposed, in view of the report of the Tariff Board, which they by their votes had helped to create in the Sixty-first Congress, and the objections made by the President in his veto of House bill 12812, that in the presenting of a new bill some features might be changed so that there might be some possibility of enacting into law a bill which should meet the approval of the President.

But with the same obstinacy that has characterized all attempts to prepare tariff bills, we find ourselves confronted with the same bill that had heretofore been debated and passed by both the House and Senate. Not an "i" dotted nor a "t" crossed, but a change in number only, being the result of many months' incubation.

That is certainly constructive statesmanship with a vengeance. It involves no labor to prepare such a bill, because with no hearings being held the only act necessary is to put a new number on the bill and report the same to the House. I think no one will be deceived by such unheard-of practices.

Clearly the bill was only introduced in order to demonstrate that the Congress was busy with tariff legislation, and therefore there was some excuse for the two bodies to remain on guard in Washington. The discourtesy shown to operatives and manufacturers by the abrupt refusal of the Committee on Ways and Means to grant any opportunity for the presentation of facts showing the bearing that the proposed changes in the cotton tariff would have on the wage earners as well as the manufacturers was in marked contrast to the course pursued in the preparation and consideration of the Wilson tariff, the Dingley tariff, or the Payne tariff acts and all former tariff bills heretofore enacted, all of which have vitally affected the grower of cotton or the operative or manufacturer.

The district which honors me with its confidence contains more than one-fourth of all the cotton spindles in the United States, and the city of Fall River, Mass., where I reside, has more than one-seventh of all the cotton spindles in the country.

Nearly 70,000 persons are directly employed in the cotton mills of the district. The question of their employment and wages is not only of importance to themselves and their families, but it affects the farmers of the surrounding country, who obtain their sustenance by selling the products of their labor.

When the former bill was considered in the House of Representatives many questions were propounded to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

These he answered in a flippant manner, which I am sure would not have been applauded by the operatives in the cotton mills, but which had the approval of his partisan colleagues.

Nearly every one of these operatives in the cotton mills of New England know what it costs to make a yard of cloth, and they are also familiar with the selling price of the product. If the Members of this honorable body had the same amount of information, they would be a little more careful than they now are about throwing open the American market to the competition of the lower priced labor and the less cost of production, because of the less amount of capital invested by the foreign manufacturer in the construction of a similar manufacturing plant, in many of the countries on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean or in the oriental countries across the Pacific Ocean.

Who is calling for the reduction of the tariff on cotton goods? I will answer, the free trader. His love of country is based upon the narrow idea of procuring whatever he needs for his comfort, luxury, or necessity in the cheapest market. He thinks not of employment for his fellow men. He can not see beyond himself. He is the best representative of sordid selfishness. The golden rule is not one of his cardinal precepts.

Does anyone in his right mind believe that a single person employed in a cotton manufacturing plant is complaining of the high price of the product of his labor? They realize that the market price of the product of their labor is but slightly above the cost of production. They know that if the theories of the Democratic Party are put into practice the result will be that goods will be manufactured abroad, and as a consequence they know that every yard of goods manufactured abroad will take the place of the products of American labor.

Neither the mill operative, the manufacturer, or the laborer is calling for a reduction of the tariff on cotton goods. Therefore we can conclude that the nonproducer is the element in society which is calling the loudest for a reduction of tariff duties on cotton goods.

The laboring and producing members of the body politic can not agree to a reduction of duties when they know that it would result in providing more employment for mill operatives in Great Britain, Continental Europe, India, Japan, or China, and no argument put forth by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle regarding the cheapness with which goods can be produced abroad and the advantage it would be to have the tariff reduced so that these productions of foreign capital and foreign labor can be more readily brought into competition with the capital and laborers employed in the cotton mills of this country will be accepted as logical.

Past experience has demonstrated every time this antiquated method of producing prosperity has been put in practice by the unwise legislation of the Democratic Party that it brings disaster and ruin to the cotton industry, and distress, lack of employment, and deprivation of the comforts of life to the mill operative and his family.

I am opposed to all such theories, as the Democratic Party by proposing such legislation endeavors to foist upon the people, because it can benefit no one; but on the other hand it means disaster to the capitalist and distress and ruin to the operative.

As it would take away the purchasing power of both of the parties I have alluded to, each of whom are dependent upon the prosperity of the other, it would have a far-reaching influence upon every other industry in the United States.

We have indications of great crops of every kind to be produced by the American farmer.

Every citizen of the United States is vitally interested in the production of the necessities of life. I would assume that no American with a spark of patriotism in his soul would desire that the producer of raw cotton should be compelled to sell the product of his investment and labor at a price below the cost of production.

In fact, I believe that it is a sound business proposition that labor and capital should find adequate compensation. Cotton is distinctively an American product, which is practically without competition from abroad. It has puzzled my brain to understand why the Democratic majority in this House, when to that cotton is added the cost of erecting a factory building and equipping the same with machinery, there should be a determined and insistent demand that the product of that added labor and capital should be subjected to competition from abroad.

This is an unexplainable mystery, which the American voter will be interested to have explained without equivocation in the coming national campaign by the Democratic orators at the same time that they are whining because President Taft vetoes their ill-considered and carelessly prepared legislation which they send to him not with the purpose of having the same enacted into law, but with the intention of putting the President "into a hole."

My colleague from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], a single member of the Republican minority of the Ways and Means Committee, presented a bill which was supported by nearly all of the minority Members present in the House.

The gentleman from Connecticut is able and distinguished. He was for many years a successful woolen manufacturer.

There is a vast difference between the manufactures of cotton and that of wool. I would coincide quite fully with his views on the wool industry, but I could not coincide with his conclusions on the cotton industry. Therefore I voted against the bill presented by Mr. HILL, as I did against the bill reported by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Neither of them, in my judgment, were accorded sufficient consideration or hearing before the Committee on Ways and Means—the most important committee of the House of Representatives.

The Democratic Party were in full control of the Government from March 4, 1853, to March 4, 1861.

After that period they were sometimes in control of the House and sometimes in the control of the Senate. They have been twice intrusted with the office of President, and during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress they controlled the Senate and House in addition to the Presidency.

Their record of constructive legislation is practically unknown to the present generation.

During the year 1909 more than $10,000,000 additional capital was invested in the fine yarn and fine goods industry in the city of New Bedford, and more than $6,000,000 was invested in that city during the year 1910. Sixteen mills in number were added to the number that the city formerly contained. They use the finer grades of sea-island and Egyptian cotton and the better grades of American cotton, and their product is very largely of the quality heretofore imported. The reduction of the tariff proposed in this bill will cause a much greater quantity of similar products to pass the customhouses and enter into active and severe competition with the individuals who have massed their contributions in taking stock in the various corporations which have been organized to promote and extend this important industry.

During the past 10 years the city of New Bedford increased in population 54.6 per cent and now contains more than 100,000 people.

No adequate reason for the vicious attack made upon the principal industry of this thriving community by the proposed bill has been advanced, nor is there any valid reason why the special industry located in the district which I have the honor to represent should be called upon to meet the great burden proposed to be inflicted upon it by the radical conditions contained in the bill presented in this House, and which it is proposed to enact into law as far as this House can, by a decree of the caucus of the Democratic Party, without granting a hearing to either the owners of the mills or the operatives who earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brows.

Before the special session of the Congress had been called after the adjournment of the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, during conversation which took place between myself and a leading cotton manufacturer of fine goods of my own city, he related to me an interesting fact, which I desire to bring to the attention of the Members of the House.

He stated a short time previously he had made up a grade of goods that he thought he could find a ready market for at the price of 8¼ cents per yard. He placed the samples in the hands of his New York brokers, but owing to the depressed condition of the cotton industry no buyer could be found. He therefore placed the samples with a Boston broker, who received an offer of 8¼ cents per yard. This offer was finally accepted.

After filling the first order and the same being duplicated and further demand seeming in prospect, the manufacturer stated that he journeyed to Boston and visited the large department store which had purchased the goods and sauntered around the great establishment until he arrived in that portion of the store where the goods were being sold to the consumer, and he found that the customers were buying these goods which he had sold at 8¼ cents at 25 cents per yard.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle desire to benefit the consumer by the legislation which they enact, it is very clear to my mind, as I doubt not it is to yours and to the minds of those who listen to me to-day, that the point of attack should not be at the customhouse, but at some point to be determined by careful study and deliberation of the conditions which prevail between the manufacturer and the ultimate consumer.

The great advance and growth of the cotton-manufacturing industry in the Southern States is but a natural and welcome feature of the prosperity of the Nation itself. The northern manufacturer welcomes this new factor in the Nation's life. They recognize that the more modern factories and the former abundance of native help were advantages which, added to the close proximity to the raw material, were important factors in the competitive line of production to which they were compelled to adapt themselves.

The South has produced very largely the coarser grades of yarn and cloth. With the lapse of time and the benefit of experience and improvements in methods and machinery, the southern manufacturer at this time is seeking to produce the finer grades of yarn and cloth; but this condition arouses no feeling of indignation or dissatisfaction with their northern competitors.

The competition of the foreign manufacturer, who is not bound by American regulations, American standards of living, American wages, nor hampered by the larger capital required to construct and maintain his plant, is the competition to which neither the northern nor southern manufacturer have heretofore been subjected; and by the granting of redutcions at the customhouse to the foreign manufacturers, who have long sought the American market—the best market in the world—the provisions of the pending bill will make it a great deal easier for them to flood the American market with the products of their capital and labor to the detriment of American industries and American labor.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts, realizing that education has been one of the greatest factors in its advancement to the higher standards of excellence since the Pilgrim Fathers nearly 300 years ago landed on Plymouth Rock, several years ago entered upon the policy of establishing textile schools, in order that the rising generation might be the better equipped with the requisite knowledge in the production of higher grades of textile manufacturing. Builders of modern, improved machinery contributed liberally to each of three textile schools established in that Commonwealth. The State appropriated the money necessary for their construction, and the city of Lowell, where my colleague, Representative BUTLER AMES, resides, and the cities of Fall River and New Bedford, in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent, cooperated with the State in providing money for their maintenance in order to provide for the free education of its people.

The purpose of this higher education was to equip with experimental knowledge the rising generations, in order that they might produce the higher grades of textile manufacture in America, instead of buying the same abroad. No foreign manufacturer contributes to this enterprise, but by the provisions of the pending bill the foreign manufacturer finds encouragement at American customhouses to neutralize the efforts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to improve its methods of textile manufactures and advance the interests of its citizens. I am one of the trustees of the textile school in Fall River and was the first signer of the petition for its establishment.

In the matter of hours of labor in the cotton manufacturing establishments Massachusetts takes the foremost rank. They were the first to enact the 10-hour law. By acts of legislation since that time they have reduced the hours of labor to 58 hours and to 56 hours, and the Legislature of Massachusetts, at its session for 1911, enacted the 54-hour law for cotton operatives, and it went into effect January 1, 1912.

Massachusetts has now a Democratic governor, but the Republican Party has always had a majority in its legislature since the party was formed in 1854, a period of 58 years.

Massachusetts is a manufacturing State. She produces none of the raw materials which her artisans, mechanics, and operatives by their labor, skill, and intelligence prepare for the use of the American people. She does not want the pending bill enacted into law.

If I were to be governed wholly by political considerations, I would gladly welcome the passage of the pending bill. But, Mr. Speaker, viewing the proposition upon the broader lines which should govern a subject of such great importance, I sincerely hope the bill may not be enacted into law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Dingley law as passed by the Republican Party in 1897 remained in force for 12 years, which was a longer existence than had been accorded to any other tariff act in the history of this country. For 10 years after the passage of this law the Republican Party confidently claimed that the country was prosperous as the result of this act. Yet a short study of the facts will show that prosperity resulted in spite of the Dingley Act, and not because of it. An exactly similar wave of prosperity followed the tariff act of 1846, which was passed by the Democrats and continued in force for 11 years, making it second to the Dingley Act in point of duration. This period is commonly spoken of as the free-trade era, though this act did no more than apply the principle of tariff for revenue on an ad valorem basis. During this period the country enjoyed a long era of prosperity, and this being the case, the tariff remained untouched, for the country was involved in a discussion of slavery and weightier questions were at issue. An exactly similar state of affairs explains the long continuance of the Dingley Act. The country, owing to internal conditions, prospered in spite of this law, and centered its attention upon the problem of dealing with great trust combinations, destined to be the great question of the twentieth century. These trusts owed their existence in a large measure to the high-protective tariff, hence after 10 years, prompted by the business complications resulting in the panic of 1907, the tariff came in for its share of attention and its revision was demanded by the American people as a step in the curbing of the trusts.

The Republican Party, having become conscious of the trend of public opinion, and of the general demand throughout the country for a reduction in tariff duties, went before the people in the campaign of 1908 with a promise of downward revision They made the campaign solely on this issue, and the people of this country, relying on their promise of downward revision, returned the Republican Party to power.

On March 15, 1909, President Taft called an extraordinary session of Congress for the purpose of revising the tariff. The tariff was revised, but the Republican Party, unable to break away from the habits of a lifetime, again revised the tariff, not in the interests of the people whom they had been placed in power to serve, but in the interests of the great trusts of this country, to whom their first allegiance has always been given. As a result, the average ad valorem rate of duty on dutiable imports amounted in 1911 under the Payne-Aldrich Act to 41.22 per cent as compared with 44.16 per cent in 1905 under the Dingley Act. Because of the prohibitive rates of duty which exist on many articles in the present tariff act making it impossible for imports to come in, the average of 41.22 per cent in 1911 is below the average rate of duty assessed in the act. In the campaign of 1910 the Republican Party went before the people with this tariff as the fulfillment of its pledges to revise downward, and the results of that election show the appreciation felt by the people of this country for the way in which the Republican Party had broken faith with them. A Republican majority of 45 in the House of Representatives in the Sixty-first Congress was changed to a Democratic majority of 68 in the Sixty-second Congress. The voice of the people had spoken, and in unmistakable terms it demanded lower tariff duties levied in the interests of the people of this country and not in the interests of predatory wealth.

Government is and has always been merely the organized form of the state through which the general will is expressed. The state, by which is meant the people of the entire country, and which is only another expression for the national consciousness, subject always to the limitations of the Constitution, is the supreme power, and when its will is clearly indicated it must be carried out. Government is only the mechanism for executing the will of the people, and that government best performs its functions which most nearly expresses the General Will, clearly and intelligently indicated. Of all the governments which have been evolved in the history of the world the American Government most nearly reaches perfection in this respect. It most nearly approaches man's ideal of a true democracy, and over the earlier democracies of the world it possesses the added advantage of certain checks, of which the chief bulwark is the Constitution, insuring stability to this Government and protecting the people from hasty and ill-advised changes in the fundamental principles of the Government. Once in two years the people of this country are given the opportunity of saying whether their will is being expressed by the manner in which the party in power is conducting the Government. Two years ago they showed in unmistakable terms their disapproval of the work of the Republican Party and of its policy, which has always been to levy tariff duties, not primarily for the support of this Government, but for the protection of the great corporations, with revenue for the Government as only an incidental factor.

The Democratic Party was restored to power in the House of Representatives on the promise that gradual reductions should be made and the tariff restored again to a basis of revenue. In compliance with these promises that party has proceeded to make a reduction in the schedules of the tariff to a point where they will give no unnecessary taxation while still yielding an income adequate for the support of the Government. The Democratic Party has never stood for free trade; it has always maintained that tariff duties for revenue should be imposed, and incidentally, of course, some protection will always follow. It has not held, however, as has the Republican Party, that protection should be the essential feature with revenue for the Government as only an incidental factor. It was Francis Lieber, one of the greatest political economists this country has ever seen, who, in speaking of duty in its higher sense, enunciated this maxim, "No right without its duty, no duty without its right." The latter part of this maxim, if we may be allowed to take duty in its tariff sense, may be said to well express the attitude of the Democratic Party toward the levying of tariff duties. No duty should be levied unless Congress has an absolute right to impose it, and the only right given Congress for levying any tariff duty is to provide sufficient revenue for the support of the Government. This principle is enunciated in the words of that great Democrat, Andrew Jackson, whom I quote with especial pride because he was born in the district which I have the honor of representing in this House. In his farewell message he said:

> There is perhaps no one of the powers conferred on the Federal Government so liable to abuse as the taxing power. The most productive and convenient sources of revenue were necessarily given to it, that it might be able to perform the most important duties imposed upon it; and the taxes which it lays upon commerce being concealed from the real payer in the price of the article do not so readily attract the attention of the people as smaller sums demanded from them directly by the tax gatherer. But the taxes imposed on goods enhances by so much the price of the commodity to the consumer, and as many of these duties are imposed on articles of necessity which are daily used by the great body of the people, the money raised by these imposts is drawn from their pockets. Congress has no right under the Constitution to take money from the people unless it is required to execute some one of the specific powers intrusted to the Government; and if they raise more than is necessary for such purposes it is an abuse of the power of taxation, both unjust and oppressive. It may, indeed, happen that the revenue will sometimes exceed the amount anticipated when the taxes were laid. When, however, this is ascertained it is easy to reduce them; and in such case it is unquestionably the duty of the Government to reduce them, for no circumstance can justify it in assuming a power not given to it by the Constitution, nor in taking away the money of the people when it is not needed for the legitimate wants of the Government.

In these words are found a true statement of Democratic principles. The Democratic Party has remained true to its standards, and to-day stands as the champion of the great mass of the citizens of this Republic, advocating, as regards both the humblest citizen and the greatest corporation, equal rights and equal privileges. The words of Jackson are reechoed in the latest platform of the Democratic Party, as well as the platform of 1908, upon which that party was restored to power in the House of Representatives, and from which I quote the following plank:

We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list, and material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessities of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home, and gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis.

Immediately upon the convening of Congress in April, 1911, the Democrats of the House of Representatives proceeded to a fulfillment of these pledges. Tariff bills were passed by the House so just and beneficial in their provisions that not even a Republican Senate dared to stop their passage, and but for the hasty vetoes of a Republican President would have resulted in laws of untold benefit to this country.

The first bill passed by the Sixty-second Congress was the farmers' free list, which removed all tariff duties from agricultural implements, leather, boots and shoes, cotton ties, cotton bagging, lumber, meat, flour, food preparations, saddles and harness, salt, fence wire, and sewing machines. The estimated total value of these articles consumed in this country per annum is $2,760,000,000. The tariff rate on them ranged under the Payne-Aldrich law from 7 per cent to 51 per cent, or an average of about 18.75 per cent on the entire group. Now, assuming that the rate of tariff duty is 50 per cent effective in increasing prices to the consumer, the estimated saving to the consumers of this country from putting these articles on the free list would have amounted to $390,000,000 in a 12-months' period. This saving would have been directly felt, especially by the poorer people of the country, for the articles from which it was proposed to remove tariff duties are all among the first necessities of life. The President, although elected upon a platform promising reduction in tariff duties and of the cost of living, at once vetoed the Underwood bill, giving as a pretext that he had not yet heard from his so-called Tariff Board, and therefore any tariff revision made by the Democrats was unreliable.

No Tariff Board report or the report of any other board is necessary to show that tariff duties should be removed from the articles included in this bill. Agricultural implements, so necessary to the great farming class, which is the backbone and future hope of this country, are taxed so heavily that a complete monopoly is given to the Harvester Trust, and the farmer is forced to pay whatever price that trust demands. In fact, the protection given this trust is so high that the cost of transportation can be paid on American-made machines and they may still be sold abroad, with profit, at a lower price than they are sold at home. The same thing is true of sewing machines, which are as much a necessity to the American household as are agricultural implements to the farmer. When the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was before Congress manufacturers of boots and shoes declared that if hides were put upon the free list they could manufacture boots and shoes in competition with the world. In the Underwood bill hides have been put upon the free list, and there is therefore no reason why protection should be granted to manufacturers of boots and shoes. Meats, flour, timber, salt, cement, and lime are among the first necessities of life to all the 92,000,000 people of this country, and any protective duty placed upon them only raises the cost of living for those who can least afford to pay it.

This country has become an exporting rather than an importing country as regards these articles, and there can be no excuse, therefore, even from a protective standpoint, for keeping them on the tax list. To illustrate, our production of agricultural implements amounts to almost $111,000,000 per annum, our exports of them to over $25,000,000, and our imports to less than $170,000. Again, in the case of fresh and preserved meats our production is valued at approximately $800,000,000, of which we export about $150,000,000 and import about $500,000.

In view of facts such as these it is evident that tariff duties on the above-named articles bring to the Government a minimum amount of revenue. Yet the policy of the Republican Party is to maintain a high duty on these articles, although it results in little benefit to the Government and in great hardship to the consumers. The Democratic platform, on the other hand, declares specifically that it favors the placing upon the free list of trust-controlled products and material reductions in the tariff duties upon the necessities of life. The free-list bill as passed by the Democrats of this House and by the Senate was in full compliance with this declaration, and, as was said above, had it become law it is estimated that the saving to the American consumer would have been over $390,000,000 per annum.

The next bill passed by the Democrats of the House was one reducing the duties on wool. The tariff duties on wool as contained in Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill were declared by President Taft himself in his Winona speech in 1910 as being "indefensible."

In this schedule as now constituted under the Payne bill the Republican principle of protection finds a more complete expression than in any other schedule of the tariff. On woolen goods, which after food are among the first necessities of life for all the people of this country, a tax was placed by the Republican Party which was almost prohibitive. The ad valorem tariff rate on imported woolen manufactures for 1910 was 90.10 per cent, being the highest rate imposed by the Payne-Aldrich law. Such a rate is not designed to obtain revenue for the Government, for by its very nature it is so prohibitive as to yield very little revenue. It is levied in the interest of the woolen manufacturers, and in effect gives them complete control over the woolen trade in America.

In 1909 we imported $18,102,416 of woolen manufactures, as against a production at home of $514,732,000. At the same time the woolen manufactures which we exported amounted to only the nominal sum of $1,971,739, thus showing what a complete control of the American woolen market has been given to the American woolen manufacturers. Yet such a state of affairs is in accordance with the avowed Republican principle of protection, which holds, as announced in its 1908 platform—that the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

In accordance also with the Republican idea to insure protection to the American manufacturers, the manufacturer himself was allowed to state to the Ways and Means Committee what was the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, and his statements were blindly followed by the Republicans and the rates fixed in accordance with them. That persons so vitally interested in the result should have been allowed to testify at all seems surprising, and the inaccuracy of their statements, upon which the schedule was based, can not be a matter of wonder. These manufacturers declared with much insistence that to maintain "the true principle" of protection the duties must be kept very high, if not higher than they were before. As a further proof that the prosperity of the country depended upon the maintenance of such high duties, they declared that otherwise they could not afford to pay such high wages as at present, and the workingman would suffer. It was the old cry which has been raised so often, that to compete with cheap foreign labor the manufacturer must have protection if he is to pay the present high wages. Prof. Taussig exposes this fallacy in his Tariff History of the United States, page 365, from which is quoted the following extract:

One of the most familiar facts of industry, though one most commonly forgotten in the protective controversy, is that high wages do not necessarily mean high prices of things produced. When labor is effective high wages and low prices go together. The truth is that high general level of real wages is the outcome of high general efficiency of labor. Given such efficiency it would continue, tariff or no tariff.

In his speech of June 17, 1911, in this House, Mr. REDFIELD gives facts which clearly bear out these observations of Prof. Taussig and prove that because of the efficiency of the American workman high wages will continue to be paid and can afford to be, nor will high prices necessarily follow. Indeed, low prices result or else our American manufacturers could not afford to pay the high wages demanded by American laborers at home and yet sell goods in foreign countries, in competition with foreign labor, as many American concerns certainly do. All this goes to prove the inaccuracy of the statements made by manufacturers upon which the woolen schedule rates were based.

The Underwood bill, as passed by the Democrats, reduced the duty on raw wool from an equivalent ad valorem duty of 42.20 per cent in 1911 to an ad valorem rate of 20 per cent, and on manufactures of wool from an equivalent ad valorem rate of 87.65 per cent in 1911 to 42.55 per cent. Another change provided by the bill was the substitution of ad valorem duties for the combination of specific and ad valorem duties, which make the interpretation of the Payne-Aldrich bill impossible by any except a Government expert. The President, however, chose to veto this bill also, and the woolen trusts were allowed to further enrich themselves at the expense of the consumers in this country.

At the present session of Congress the report of the President's Tariff Board, on which he placed so much reliance, was submitted to the House of Representatives.

It was carefully analyzed by the Democrats, but was found to contain no information which justified the Democrats in changing the woolen bill as passed at the last session. Not even the Republicans can agree on what the report of the Tariff Board means, or what would be a fair rate, in accordance with the so-called scientific information. This grows out of the impracticability of the theory of the President and his party of attempting to ascertain the difference in cost of production here and abroad. Had the President chosen to aid the Democrats in their efforts to serve the country by passing the woolen bill of last session over $50,000,000 in the past 12 months would have been left in the hands of the American people. Such, however, would not be in accordance with the avowed Republican program of protection for the trusts.

The next schedule which the Democrats undertook to revise at the last session of Congress was the cotton schedule. Under the Payne-Aldrich law an equivalent ad valorem duty of 47.05 per cent during 1911 was imposed on all cotton manufactures. The Democrats passed a bill through the House reducing the duties to an average of 27.06 per cent, but the presidential veto was again evoked to prevent the enactment of this measure into law. On March 26, 1912, the President sent a message to Congress with which he submitted a report of the Tariff Board on the cotton schedule. As with the wool report of the Tariff Board, the Democrats very carefully analyzed the cotton data thus submitted with a view to checking up the results of their work of last summer on the cotton schedule. No reason was found for changing the rates of duty already fixed by the Democrats, and the cotton bill of last session was again introduced during the present session of Congress. As a matter of experiment, a Republican Member, under the guidance of the light shed by the Tariff Board's report, worked out a revision of the cotton schedule in accordance with the facts given in this report. As a result, the bill evolved by him is made to impose a duty within 2 per cent of the duty imposed under the Democratic bill of last session. It is certainly worthy of note that the Democrats, having access to the same information as had the Republicans in 1909, produced a bill levying a duty within 2 per cent of the rate recommended by the Tariff Board's report, while the Republicans, in 1909, evolved a bill levying a duty so far in excess of a justifiable rate.

At the present session of Congress the Democrats passed a bill reducing the duty on metals and the manufactures of metals from an average ad valorem rate in 1911 of 32.03 per cent under the Payne-Aldrich law to 22.42 per cent. The United States Steel Corporation, with its net earnings of a billion dollars in 10 years, is one of the most appalling examples of the giant growths that have sprung up under the Republican policy of high protection. No one is more interested in the prosperity of this country or in the growth of its commercial and manufacturing interests than is the Democratic Party, for in this age a country's greatness is, to a large extent, measured by its commercial supremacy. When, however, the growth of the corporate interests of a country is at the expense of the great mass of its citizens and works for the benefit, not of the people of the country, but of a small body of capitalists, then the further growth of such a corporation should not be aided by undue advantage given it by the Government under the guise of tariff laws. The United States Steel Corporation at the present time is in active competition with all the world in the manufactures of metals, and by such great steel manufacturers as Carnegie, Schwab, and Gary, it has been admitted that iron and steel products may be manufactured in this country as cheaply as anywhere in the world. The surplus products of the United States Steel Corporation are sold abroad in active competition with the markets of the world, and I contend that it is the duty of this Government not to promote a state of affairs where the foreigner and not the American citizen enjoys the advantages accruing from the marketing of this surplus production.

In the chemical schedule the Democrats reduced the duties from an average ad valorem rate in 1911 of 25.72 per cent, under the Payne-Aldrich law, to 16.66 per cent. This schedule was revised on a strictly revenue basis, reducing the duties on articles of general use, as medicine, chemicals, and dyestuff used in the wool, cotton, and paper industries, and placing the burden of raising the revenue on those industries most capable of supporting it.

Sugar has been placed by the Democrats on the free list. This bill will directly affect every household in this country by removing the heavy tax on an article of absolute necessity. Should the free-sugar bill proposed by the Democrats become law, fully $115,000,000 annually, which the people of this country now pay to the Sugar Trust, will be saved. To make good the loss of $53,000,000 in revenue from placing sugar on the free list the Democrats propose to raise sufficient revenue by an excise tax, which will extend the corporation tax so as to bring under it individuals, firms, and copartnerships, and will place the burden of taxation on those most able to bear it.

Such has been the constructive tariff legislation which the Democratic Party has tried to enact into law in accordance with the promise whereby it was restored to power in this House. The tariff revision that has been proposed has been honest and made in the full conviction that it will result in benefit to the great mass of citizens of this Republic. The issue between the Democratic and the Republican Parties is clear. The policy of the Republican Party is to place on all articles manufactured in this country a tariff so high that the manufacturer will be protected from all outside competition. As a result a majority of the necessities of life (such as clothing, sugar, farming implements, sewing machines, and many other articles too numerous to mention) can be purchased in foreign countries at from 25 per cent to 100 per cent cheaper than they can be bought in the United States. From a tax on such goods the Government derives very little revenue, for the manufacture of practically all such articles is controlled by the trusts and the high protective tariff gives them a complete monopoly of the American market.

To illustrate, take the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, and the Meat Trust, to whom such protection is given by the law that they are enabled to charge the American consumer exorbitant and unreasonable prices for their products. From this high-protective tax maintained on their products practically no revenue goes in the Treasury of the United States, but a great deal of revenue does go into the pockets of these trusts. The revenue raised by tariff taxes annually amounts to a little more than $330,000,000. For the money that is raised in this way for the support of the Government it is estimated that under the Republican tariff laws there is taken out of the pockets of the American consumer and given to the trusts more than two thousand million dollars, not one cent of which goes into the National Treasury.

Will the American people longer consent to be robbed in this way by Republican tariff laws, framed for the protection of the trusts of this country? The fight is on now, and I believe that in November the people of this country will assert their right to have the laws administered for their benefit, and will place the Democratic Party in full control of this Government. Since the Democrats came into power in the House of Representatives on the 4th of March, 1911, a Republican President and a Republican Senate have blocked the efforts of the Democrats to give relief to the people, but the time is near at hand when these obstacles will be removed.

In its convention at Baltimore the Democratic Party adopted a sane and truly progressive platform, and in it the wishes of the people of this country find complete expression. As candidates for President and Vice President, Democracy has nominated men whose splendid character, brilliant attainments, high order of statesmanship, and exalted patriotism are exemplified in both their public and private lives. Next November, by larger majorities than any Democratic nominees have received in the last 90 years, the people of this country will elect to the presidency, Woodrow Wilson, scholar, patriot, and statesman, and will place in the vice presidential chair that splendid type of American manhood, Indiana's favorite son, Thomas R. Marshall. These men on whom Democracy's choice has fallen, have made good abundantly in the offices they now hold as governor of their respective States. The American people in November will call them to higher stations and wider fields, confident that in the offices of President and Vice President the welfare of all the people, the prosperity of the whole country, and the perpetuity of its institutions will be safe in their hands. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] use the balance of his time?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to say anything on this subject this afternoon, inasmuch as I have talked so much about cotton, but still there are a few matters to which I wish to allude. The Tariff Board did not have time to send experts abroad to get the cost there in the thorough manner which they did upon the wool schedule, and hence the cost abroad does not appear in the board's report. They have, however, an exhaustive statement as to the prices abroad and the prices here, and an exhaustive and conclusive statement as to the cost in the factories in the United States. These are the facts upon which a bill must be based in the present tariff report.

I am not able to agree entirely with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] as to his conclusions concerning the bill which he introduces here. It is a much better bill than the bill presented by the majority of the committee, and for that reason I shall yield to the gentleman to make such motion as he desires in connection with it, and shall also vote to substitute it for the Underwood bill, reserving, however, to myself the privilege, if that report is ever completed by an investigation abroad, to act in accordance with the facts that then shall appear in the Tariff Board report.

The gentleman speaks of the duty placed upon mercerized goods under the present law; as he said upon mercerized manufactured goods we arrived at the duty from the statement of an old Member of the House, who had been for many years engaged in the cotton-goods industry, but who had been out of the business for several years at the time he made his statement. Later, when the matter came up before the conference committee, I found out to my satisfaction that we were misled about the difference in cost. The process of mercerization costs no more here than it does abroad. There is, however, some shrinkage in the weight and also in the measurement of the goods in going through the process of mercerization, and some duty was necessary in order to make up for the difference in the specific duties on those goods where they were based either upon the yard measure or upon the weight of the goods. But that was a small duty, and if there had been any amendment pending I should have exerted myself to have eliminated the duty on mercerized goods in the yard.

The mercerized process in yarn also costs no more here than abroad. It costs exactly the same, according to information I then obtained, and which is confirmed by the information obtained by the Tariff Board. But the duty on yarn in that bill was based on the 100-yard measurement, and I found in the process of mercerization that the length and weight of the yarn, the weight particularly, shrank 4 or 5 per cent. The Senate had put on a greater duty than that through misinformation, and I succeeded in putting it down to the exact difference according to the weight of the yarn, and I have no apology for the duty on the mercerization of yarn.

In the bill offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and in the bill offered by the committee there is some discrimination in favor of mercerization, perhaps not to so great an extent, because the duty is the same per cent ad valorem on cloths in the gray and the mercerized cloth, and the difference in the value makes up the difference in the duty, which is equal to the shrinkage in the cloth. There is no advantage in either of these bills over the present law on that question.

An interesting subject for investigation at the time we made the present tariff law was the question of children's and women's hosiery, which got to be a national question, starting out of the countingroom of a department store in the city of Chicago, and advertised in the editorials of the Chicago papers, and it seemed as if the independence and hosiery, especially of the female sex were all bound up with what we proposed to do with children's and women's hose of a certain class.

We have accurate information, Mr. Speaker, as to the cost here and the cost abroad. We acted upon exact information, and we placed the additional duty on children's and women's stocking hose, and the women and children are all wearing hose to-day at the same retail price per pair, or per dozen pairs, under the schedule where we placed them in the present law, and they are happy. And there are thousands of young women, some of whom came here—young ladies who would grace any parlor in the land—to ask us to put on a little duty and start up the stocking mills. We did this, and we started the mills, and the girls are happy. And the women who came down here representing the department stores of Chicago are happy. And there is no one who feels any the worse for it except merchants in Chicago who are manufacturing stockings abroad and have to pay a little more duty to get them in here than they did before.

Now, what I object to in Mr. HILL's bill is that he did not preserve that duty according to the present law and not go into any ad valorem duty, however high it may be, and subject those mills to the tender mercies of the guilty consciences of those importers of stockings in this country who run the department stores and are not satisfied with getting retail and wholesale profits, but demand also the profits on undervaluations in getting those goods over here. He made a mistake in it; but his bill is better in that respect than the Underwood bill, because the duty upon these goods is higher.

Mr. Speaker, the Tariff Board's report shows that the cheaper grades of cotton cloths, such as they make in Alabama and the surrounding Southern States, and some of which business is left in some of the Northern States, are sold actually cheaper from the mills in the United States than abroad in competition with the mills we meet in mutual markets abroad; and, as the gentleman from Connecticut says, some of them have been sold in the Lancashire district in Great Britain, showing, or tending to show, at least, that they can be produced as cheaply or more cheaply here. And the Tariff Board supplied the reason for it in their report. We have been improving in cotton machinery, and have got to that point where an American mechanic can run from 20 up to 28 looms at once, because of the automatic machinery which changes the bobbin from an empty bobbin to a full bobbin without stopping the operation of the machine or calling the attention of the operator of the machine.

Our people have introduced those looms almost exclusively in the United States in some makes of cotton goods. The same looms are open to our English competitors. They can buy them over there and make them there. They are allowed under the patents the same privileges of these machines that we have here. But they have not seen fit to adopt them.

Why? Because the rules of the labor unions in Great Britain prevent generally their using more than 4 looms per operative, instead of from 20 to 28 as here, and in consequence only 4 looms can be used there, while the manufactory is under the control of the labor unions over there.

That is the reason why we make these goods cheaper. We pay higher wages, and if they could run the 28 looms that we do they could make the goods more cheaply, and the difference would have to be met by a duty.

Now, that is a pretty uncertain foundation on which to base a tariff bill and an uncertain reason for taking off the duty, because now the labor unions seem to be controlling this thing. How long will it be before their grip will be removed? Why, it will be just when Great Britain loses her cotton trade, as she is now losing it, under these conditions that are imposed, to such an extent that the workman can not get even four looms to run, or any looms to run; and then labor will wake up and they will put in those men who are more efficient, even if they are as efficient as those who run the woolen looms, where labor produces more in England than it does in the United States.

When they do that we shall need the protective duty. It will take a little time to change that condition, but it is not safe to take off all the duty, and I believe that the duties provided for in the Hill bill ought at least to be kept on these goods. The author of the Hill bill has reduced the duties below those of the Underwood bill; he has cut them in two. On those goods the Hill bill has a protection, and the Underwood bill has protection twice over.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that there ought not to be any sectionalism in this bill. I do not like to charge that there is anything of the kind. It only "happens" so that these duties are so outrageously high on these goods that are made down there, and it "happened" when these gentlemen brought in a fake farmer's free-list bill that they put everything known to science in the farming industry and everything produced on farms in the Northern States on the free list, but rice was left off.

Rice remains where it is under the present law, with a protective duty upon it. Of course there was no design in that. That was thoroughly an accident. And accidents, like lightning, sometimes strike more than once in the same place. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Underwood bill is an unbalanced bill. It is prohibitive in some of its duties, and yet they call it a revenue-only measure. For heaven's sake, what do you gentlemen mean? Prohibitive revenues for revenue only! Yet you have them there.

Then when you come to knit goods, your bill does not measure up to protection, and you do not measure up to full revenue in your duty. So you go on a hop, skip, and jump all through the bill. Why did you not go over it again? Why did you not profit by what you have learned in the last year, even if you had to turn your backs on the Tariff Board report and maintain your insane opposition to what the people of this country want, namely, a board of experts to examine into all these subjects and report, in order that we may have a more intelligent tariff revision?

So, Mr. Speaker, as I said, I shall vote for the Hill substitute as a good deal better than the Underwood bill.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will say I am looking at it from a different standpoint, that I am looking at it from a protectionist point of view. Well, I am looking at it from a point that will adjust the duties to the difference in cost here and abroad on these important articles. I stand for that, as I have always stood for it. I stand for it as the majority of the American people have always stood for it whenever we have had a square vote on it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PAYNE. I have only two or three minutes. I do not think the gentleman will throw any light on my remarks.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman will excuse me. I decline to yield. Now, Mr. Speaker, having embalmed that fly—I do not mean to speak disrespectfully of my friend from Alabama. I mean the fly that he was pushing out in this direction. I am for protection, Mr. Speaker, because the greatest prosperity in this country, from the foundation of it down to to-day, has been while we have had a protective tariff that fostered our industries. It has helped everybody. It has helped the wage earner by giving him continuous employment at good wages. It has helped the farmer by giving him a market at his own door. Why, God bless you gentlemen from the West, how do you suppose our farmers in the State of New York would live if it was not for the protective tariff that gives them a market right at their own doors? When you bring your wheat and corn and the products of your farms and sell them against our markets the New York farmer can not make much money on those articles, and he is raising garden stuff and berries and fruits, and everything that he can grow there, and selling them to the people who work for wages which the protective tariff enables them to earn, which in that way gives the farmer a nearby market. Yes, and he has a little advantage, too, when he has a little wheat left over that he can sell for use in the nearby prosperous town. He can get a little better price for it than you can get for yours after you have paid your transportation. And so our farmers live and are prosperous. And out of this magnificent work of the protective tariff that brings prosperity to the people of the United States, a prosperity which comes to no other people under the sun, a prosperity which is recognized by every great statesman of all the nations of the earth, the other nations want a share. So it has happened that no country in the world to-day is without a protective tariff save Great Britain; and even in Great Britain they have so many wharf and dockage charges, and official fees and things of that kind, that they get somewhat of the benefit of protection even without a tariff on protected industries.

So I am for a bill that protects. I wish the Hill bill had been drawn a little more on the line of protection. I wish they had not overlooked the stocking schedule, but had maintained the present duties on stockings, which this Tariff Board report shows were as nearly right as you could make them to-day. That is shown in the evidence presented on page 615 of the board's cotton report. If the gentleman from Connecticut had done that, then he would have had a better bill.

When we come to pass it in the next Congress, or soon after, we will make it ideal all the way through; we will give the Tariff Board a little more time and a little more money to get the exact cost across the water. We are not afraid of the light, we are not afraid of the facts. Turn on the light, and we will make a bill in accordance with the facts and the light that comes to us.

I wish we could have had the light three years ago that we have got now from the Tariff Board. I wish we could have had the benefit of the Tariff Board then. We did the best we could, we worked night and day to get at the facts, but the life of a Congress is too short. Why, the great industries of this country, the work of this country, is so broad, so varied, so magnificent in all its proportions, that the life of a single Congress is not long enough, no matter how diligent men may be, to get all of these facts. When the Democracy comes to settle for the moment with their constituencies they will see it as we do, and once more, as a little over a year ago, we will be unanimous for a Tariff Board in the House and in the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, has the other side consumed all its time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARRISON of New York). All the time of the minority has been exhausted. The gentleman from Alabama has 1 hour and 28 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House with an extended argument in reference to this bill. When it was presented to the House a year ago I fully discussed all the details of the bill and it is not necessary to make an extended argument now.

Yesterday, I stated in the RECORD our conclusions in reference to the report of the Tariff Board. I have been entertained and somewhat amused by the arguments that have been made by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, especially those arguments of my Republican brethren, explaining why they intended to vote for the substitute that will be offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. They pride themselves on the fact, and state in the House that the Hill substitute is lower in its rates of duty than the Democratic bill that is presented to the House.

In the first place, I do not think that argument sets in the mouth of the standpat Republicans on that side of the aisle, when it has hardly been two years since they drove through the House the Payne tariff bill, that instead of reducing the rates of duty on the cotton schedule raised the rates of duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When they enacted into law a bill that the first year it became a law levied taxes on the American people under the cotton schedule to the amount of 48 per cent ad valorem and the following year levied rates of duty which amounted to 47 and a fraction per cent ad valorem; that these same gentlemen who to-day say they can not afford to vote for the Democratic tariff bill that only levies taxes on the American people, if it becomes a law, to the extent of 27 per cent ad valorem—that they can not afford to vote for it because they are in favor of a bill that levies a lower rate of duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I would not say anything that reflected on the character or the intelligence or the integrity of gentlemen on that side of the House, but when they come before the country with the blood of the Payne tariff bill dripping from their fingers, exacting rates that they to-day admit are exorbitant and murderous to the consuming masses of the American people, and then say, "No; we can not give you tariff relief; we can not afford to vote for the Democratic bill that cuts the rates of that bill nearly in half, because, forsooth, you have not reduced it low enough," they can not expect the American people to take them seriously. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Ah, my friends, do you expect to carry that argument to the American people? Do you expect to get the American people to believe any such argument coming from your lips? I do not; and I do not believe the people of the United States will give faith and credit to the position you are taking in the House to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As a matter of fact, I am glad the gentleman from Connecticut has introduced his bill. It sustains the Democratic position. He may be on some item a point lower than we are and on another item a point higher than we are, but it repudiates the Republican position on the tariff question. When you stand on that side of the House and vote for the bill offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, you will repudiate the position which the President of the United States took yesterday. In his letter accepting the nomination again for the Presidency of the United States, he states to the people that his position in signing the Payne tariff bill has been justified by facts and conditions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] proposes a bill that he says cuts the cotton schedule in the Payne-Aldrich bill nearly in half. Does that justify the position of the President of the United States in signing the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill? [Applause on the Democratic side.] When you go to your constituents this fall, are you going to stand for the President of the United States or for the gentleman from Connecticut? The President of the United States, in his letter of acceptance, in referring to the tariff work of Congress, said:

> On the other hand, our opponents, the Democrats, have presented to me for my signature a woolen bill and a cotton bill, both of which, if allowed to become a law, as the reports of the Tariff Board show, would have made such a radical cut in the rates on many woolen and cotton manufactures as to seriously interfere with those industries in this country. This would have forced the transfer of manufactures to England and Germany and other foreign countries.

That was the Republican position dripping down to Congress from the White House, and yet to-day the gentleman from Connecticut brings an indictment against the Democratic Party because, he says, we have not reduced our rates low enough; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who wrote the Payne bill, says that he is in favor of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut because it reduces the rates of duty lower than the Democratic tariff bill. Gentlemen, you may be able to explain this position to some one else, but you can not explain it in that way to me, and I do not think you will be able to explain it to any intelligent American constituency. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is nothing in the rate of duty that destroys an industry if it does not bring competition. There is nothing that can injure the American manufacturer unless it comes from competition from abroad, and yet we have the Republican Party to-day contending that their bill is at a lower rate and therefore will bring greater competition, and at the same time the President of the United States saying that our bill would bring too much competition, which you say bears higher rates, and because it contains a higher rate and less competition, according to your arguments, we are going to destroy an American industry.

As a matter of fact I showed and demonstrated, to my judgment, in the House last year that the total increase of importations under the cotton schedules, if this bill becomes a law, will amount to but a little over $10,000,000; that the total consumption of cotton goods in the United States amounts to over $800,000,000; that if all the goods were admitted under our bill the experts estimate may come into this country, it could not seriously injure any legitimate industry, but it will bring about some more competition. It certainly wipes out a great many of the prohibitive tariff rates that exist in the Payne-Aldrich law to-day, and, if that is the case, I say that when you voted against this bill last year your votes were not justified; that if Mr. HILL'S substitute is voted down and you vote against it to-day you can not justify your votes with the argument that your own side of the House has made [applause on the Democratic side]; that if the Republicans in this House believe that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut is correct, then the President of the United States can not justify a veto of this bill when it reaches him before this Congress adjourns.

As to the Tariff Board, their report upon this schedule is really lamentable. There is no raw material for them to report upon, because cotton is on the free list. They made some effort to investigate the cost of the yarn and the lower-grade products of the cotton industry. In reference to cloth, they did exactly what they did in the woolen schedule. They submitted samples to manufacturers.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not care to yield at this time. They submitted samples to manufacturers to ascertain from them what the manufacturer said the price should be, and then reported to Congress what conclusion they had come to after the manufacturer had told them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] More than that, as shown by the letters from the President to the Tariff Board, which I printed in the RECORD yesterday afternoon, they refused to give to the Ways and Means Committee even the information as to who the manufacturers were who told them the facts. The President of the United states challenges our bills and condemns our action, because we do not comply with the report of the Tariff Board, which is no report at all to begin with, and in the second place that same Tariff Board refuses to disclose the material facts on which their report is based. Can any man here deny the fact that it is material for a Ways and Means Committee to know who the witnesses were and how many witnesses they had before the Tariff Board? Were we not entitled to know from what sources they got their information? And yet this board did not dare give to the House of Representatives the information to which we were entitled, and you stand here ready to go to your constituents and justify your position on the report of a Tariff Board that made a report on only two or three items and then refused to disclose to you the sources of information from which they made their report. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a little while ago I undertook to interrupt the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] when he was discussing the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and stating that he stood for a tariff based on such a difference, the information to be secured by the Tariff Board; my purpose in rising then was to inform the gentleman that it is absolutely impossible to obtain this information

In the first place no sensible man is going to acquaint his competitors in the manufacturing business with the secrets of his success in the manufacture of certain goods, nor will he teach his competitor how to successfully compete with him by giving him in detail the knowledge that he has acquired as to the cost and manner of producing certain goods.

About three years ago I read a statement from an American official to the effect that the German Government had issued an edict that the secret processes used in the manufacture of cotton goods should be kept a secret. They should be given to nobody. Especially was it desired that this information be kept from the United States. The German manufacturer did not want the American manufacturer to know these secrets. France and England, I think, guard their manufacturing secrets in the same way, and it is impossible to empower any inquisitorial board to get these facts from the foreign manufacturer. Then how are you going to tell what it costs to produce cotton goods abroad? We can not obtain these facts. This is another effort on the part of the Republican Party to delay and postpone honest tariff revision. That party broke its promise to the American people, violated its platform pledges, and now hides behind a Tariff Board appointed and controlled by the President. Gentlemen, you can not deceive the American people any longer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I agree with what my colleague says, that one of the most difficult problems that confronts any expert board is to ascertain accurately the difference in the cost of production either at home or abroad, or the difference between the cost of productions of domestic manufacture.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I really do not care to yield for a question at this point.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I merely want to state in reply to what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says that I happen to know one of the secret agents in Germany, who for the last 10 years has been intrusted with the task of securing from the manufacturers figures as to the cost of their production, and I asked him the question last year at Berlin whether he had ever been refused information that he desired. He said that everywhere, in all the manufacturing concerns that he had occasion to visit, he was received with the greatest courtesy, and that they were entirely willing to give him all the facts and figures——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will ask the gentleman to give his informant's name. I would like to ask the gentleman who his witness is.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. He is one of the confidential agents of the Treasury Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is his name?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am perfectly willing to give his name.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will say this, because what he does is done at the request and by direction of the Treasury Department; his name is Mr. Frederick Achenbach.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to get the information.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, I got my information from the consular report made by the Government agents abroad. I can not lay my hand on it just now, but I stand by the statement that the German Government has issued an edict—as I stated it was reported—and will not permit anybody connected with the factories that manufacture cotton goods to give the secret processes by which they manufacture and dye those goods; and it is impossible to get the cost of the production of cotton goods in Germany.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care to pursue that line of argument.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say I did not ask particularly with respect to cotton, but I asked him whether in any instance information had been refused, and he said:

No, sir; they have received me almost with open arms, and gave me everything they knew.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it only shows that this Tariff Board in its report is the more reprehensible not to give to this House the information and the sources of information that it had at its command; but be that as it may, I challenge any man in this House to show that there is any material difference between the Tariff Board report on these items on which it did report and the conclusions reached in the bill that is now presented before us and the House. Of course, there is a broad range of cost prices presented in this report. Some are high in one material and some are low in another, but if you make anything like a reasonable average cost price of the yarns and low-grade products on which the Tariff Board did report, their report justifies the bill that we are presenting to the House to-day, and on those items on which they did not report certainly the President of the United States or gentlemen on that side of the House have no right to complain of us.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] criticized our bills, saying they were drawn without care and that they are a matter of guesswork. But I want to say to the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen on that side of the House that this bill and our other tariff bills were sent to the President of the United States more than a year ago. During that time there never has been an occasion for a Democrat, either in this Congress or out of it, to apologize for the work we have done. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet, so far as the bill is concerned that was passed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], so far as the legislation is concerned that that side of the House is responsible for, you came and started to apologize for it before the ink was dry on the paper when the President signed the bill. You had hardly put it into law before you begged an apology from the American people and asked to have some tariff experts, employed without warrant of law, to tell you how to rewrite a tariff bill to take the place of the Payne-Aldrich bill that you admitted you could not justify.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not for one moment believe that the American people misunderstand this proposition. You may becloud it with words and misleading statements, but the fact remains that the American people know that the Payne-Aldrich bill was written in the interest of protective monopoly of the United States [applause on the Democratic side]; that it was dictated by manufacturers, who, many of them, wrung from the American people over 100 per cent by reason of this tariff wall that you place on the statute books and that your Republican President is maintaining there because of his veto. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are making an earnest effort to repeal that law, to relieve this burden that the American people are suffering from, and we have made so much progress that on our votes in the past on this bill we have received the votes of a large number of Republicans on that side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] More than that, on a woolen bill and on a cotton bill, we have been able to secure enough votes in a Republican Senate to send those bills to the President of the United States. When he says that he can not sign these bills he does not point alone to a Democratic House. He points as well to men who sat in the Senate of the United States, holding their commissions from Republican constituencies, who say that the legislation that we have sent to him is justified.

You can not go to your constituency on any false assumption that if you are returned to power you intend to revise the tariff downward. The President of the United States, the standard bearer of your party, took that claim away from you on yesterday. He says that the enactment of the Payne bill into law has been justified. He does not proclaim again to the American people, like he did four years ago, that if he is returned to power he will stand for a revision downward. No, my friends on that side of the House, the President of the United States four years ago was a progressive on the tariff question. He is progressing from stand-pat Republicanism, from the tariff bills of Mr. PAYNE and Mr. DALZELL and Senator Aldrich, toward the Democratic position of an honest revision in favor of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But he does not stand there to-day. On the tariff question he has gone—horse, foot, and dragoons—into the camp of the Republican stand-pat faction of the party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He is dependent on the stand-pat tariff Republicans for his support in the coming campaign. He is dependent on the Republican stand-pat tariff Republicans for the campaign funds that he will get to run his campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You know that as well as I know it, and by offering the substitute here that you would not dare vote for or pass if you were in power, that you put here as a cloud to befog and befuddle the American people, you can not avoid the issue. Your candidate for President four years ago, as I stated, was moving toward an honest revision of the tariff. To-day he has returned to the camp of the enemy, and if you elect him to power next November there will be no honest revision of the tariff [applause on the Democratic side], and the great trusts and tariff barons in this country will once more, for four long years, stand behind the protective-tariff wall of the Payne tariff bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask for a vote on the question.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CURLEY). The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] offers a substitute for the pending bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu of the matter stricken out, the following:

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask, unless any Member desires to have it read through, that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with, in view of the fact that it has already been distributed among the Members.

Mr. PAYNE. It has not been read in the House?

Mr. HILL. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting, in lieu of the matter stricken out, the following:

"That the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of the paragraphs of Schedule I of section 1 of said act from 313 to 332, inclusive of both, and inserting in place thereof the following:

"1. Cotton card laps, sliver, roving, or roping, 5 per cent ad valorem.

"2. Cotton waste and flocks manufactured, 10 per cent ad valorem; antiseptic, medicated, or sterilized cotton, cotton waste, or flocks, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"3. Cotton yarns in the gray, or otherwise, not advanced beyond the condition of singles, by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together, not exceeding No. 40, 7½ per cent ad valorem.

"Exceeding No. 40, and not exceeding No. 80, 10 per cent ad valorem.

"Exceeding No. 80, 15 per cent ad valorem.

"4. Cotton yarn or thread not otherwise provided for, in the gray or otherwise, advanced beyond the condition of singles by grouping or twisting two or more single yarns together; and cable laid yarns or threads, in the gray, or otherwise, made by grouping or twisting two or more twisted yarns or threads together, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as the single yarns from which they are made, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

"Spool thread of cotton, crochet, darning, and embroidery cottons, on spools, shall be dutiable at the same rates of duty as the single yarns from which they are made.

"5. Cotton cloth, plain woven, in the grey, or bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, mercerized, or otherwise finished, containing not more than 5 square yards to the pound, 5 per cent ad valorem;

"Containing more than 5 and not more than 7½ square yards to the pound, 10 per cent ad valorem;

"Containing more than 7½ square yards to the pound, 15 per cent ad valorem.

"6. Cotton cloth, fancy woven, in the grey, or bleached, dyed, colored, stained, painted, printed, mercerized, or otherwise finished, containing figures produced by various weaving devices known as dobby, drop-box, leno, lappet, swivel, or any other name except Jacquard, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"7. Cotton cloth woven by means of the Jacquard attachment, not otherwise provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

"Cotton table damask, 25 per cent ad valorem; manufactures of cotton table damask, or of which cotton table damask is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 25 per cent ad valorem.

"8. Cloths containing silk or artificial silk, in which cotton is the component material of chief value, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as cotton cloths of similar weave, and in addition thereto 5 per cent advalorem.

"9. Cotton cloths filled or coated, in whole or in part, including oil-cloth of cotton, waterproof cloths composed of cotton or in which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"10. Handkerchiefs or mufflers of cotton, in the piece or otherwise, finished or unfinished, hemstitched or not, not otherwise specially provided for, shall pay the same rate of duty as the cloth of which they are made, and in addition thereto 5 per cent ad valorem.

"11. Plushes, velvets, velveteens, corduroys, and all pile fabrics made of cotton, of which cotton is the component material of chief value, whether the pile covers the entire surface or not:

"Uncut, 15 per cent ad valorem.

"Cut, in whole or in part, 40 per cent ad valorem.

"Provided, That manufactures or articles in any form, including such as are commonly known as bias dress facings or skirt bindings, made or cut from plushes, velvets, or other pile fabrics composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as the fabrics from which they are made.

"12. Curtains, table covers, and all articles manufactured of cotton chenille, or of which cotton chenille is the component material of chief value; cotton reps, Jacquard figured tapestry and Jacquard figured upholstery goods, weighing over 6 ounces per square yard, made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 40 per cent ad valorem.

"13. Stockings, hose, and half hose, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames, commercially known as seamless, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"14. Stockings, hose, or half hose, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames or knit by hand and commercially known as full-fashioned, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, valued at not more than $2 per dozen pairs, 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $2 per dozen pairs, 60 per cent ad valorem.

"15. Shirts and drawers, pants, vests, union suits, combination suits, tights, sweaters, corset covers, and all underwear of every description, made wholly or in part on knitting machines or frames, or knit by hand, finished or unfinished, not otherwise provided for, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, valued at not more than $1.50 per dozen garments, 20 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $1.50 per dozen garments and not more than $3 per dozen garments, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"Valued at more than $3 per dozen garments and not more than $6 per dozen garments, 40 per cent ad valorem.

"Valued at more than $6 per dozen garments, 45 per cent ad valorem.

"16. Men's and boys' gloves, knitted or woven, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 50 per cent ad valorem.

"17. Tire fabric or fabric suitable for use in pneumatic tires, made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 25 per cent ad valorem.

"18. Bone casings, garters, suspenders and braces, webs, webbings, and tubing, any of the foregoing composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, or of cotton and india rubber, and not embroidered by hand or machinery; spindle banding, woven, braided, or twisted lamp, stove, or candle wicking, loom harness, healds or collets, boot, shoe, and corset lacings, labels for garments or other articles; composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"Belting for machinery made of cotton and india rubber, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"19. Clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, wholly or partly manufactured, not specially provided for, composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"20. All articles made from cotton cloth, and all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"21. The term cotton cloth wherever used in the paragraphs of this schedule, unless otherwise specially provided, shall be held to include all woven fabrics composed wholly or in chief value of cotton, in the piece or cut in lengths, and shall not include any article finished, or unfinished, made from cotton cloth.

"SEC. 2. That the last clause of paragraph 347 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'Waterproof cloth composed of vegetable fiber other than cotton, whether composed in part of india rubber or otherwise, 10 cents per square yard and 20 per cent ad valorem.'

"SEC. 3. That paragraph 347 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended by adding the following proviso: 'Provided, That none of the foregoing shall apply to coated or filled cotton cloth, or articles made therefrom.'

"SEC. 4. That paragraph 348 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows: 'Shirt collars and cuffs, composed of linen, or of which linen is the component material of chief value, 40 cents per dozen pieces and 20 per cent ad valorem.'

"SEC. 5. That paragraph 349 of said act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended by striking out therefrom the words 'webs and webbings.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute as reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the substitute as reported by the Clerk.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, has that question been stated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. Those in favor of the substitute as reported by the Clerk will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed "nay."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. It takes 196 to make a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-one Members are present—less than a quorum. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. Will the Speaker state the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Members in favor of the substitute as reported by the Clerk will vote "yea"; those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 147, answered "present" 8, not voting 149, as follows:

Moyer, all of Allegheny County, Pa.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. There is a conference report on the legislative bill, a conference report on the wool bill, and I would like to get through both reports and not keep the House to too late an hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION OF CLAIMS GROWING OUT OF LATE INSURRECTION IN MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 103, now on the Speaker's table, be taken from the table and laid before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 103 be taken from the Speaker's table and laid before the House for present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I ask to have the resolution reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to make, or cause to be made under his direction, a full and thorough investigation of each and all claims of American citizens and of persons domiciled in the United States which may be called to his attention by claimants or their attorneys for damages for injuries to their persons or property, received by them or by those of whom claimants may be the legal representatives, within the boundaries of the United States, by means of gunshot wounds or otherwise inflicted by Mexican Federal or insurgent troops during the late insurrection in Mexico in the year 1911.

For the purpose of such investigation the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a commission of three officers of the Army, one of whom shall be an inspector general. Such commission shall have authority to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and to take evidence on oath relating to any such claim and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers in any such proceeding by application to the district court of the United States for the district within which any session of the commission is held, which court is hereby empowered and directed to make all orders and issue all processes necessary for that purpose, and said commission shall have all the powers conferred by law upon inspectors general of the United States Army in the performance of their duties. Such commission shall report to Congress, through the Secretary of War, as soon as practicable, its findings of fact upon each and all the claims presented to it and its conclusion as to the justice and equity thereof and as to the proper amount of compensation or indemnity thereupon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent a similar House joint resolution, No. 255, now on the calendar, was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet to-morrow, Saturday, August 3, 1912, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Quartermaster General of the Army submitting a detailed report and statements of receipts and expenditures as provided for in the fortifications appropriation bill approved August 1, 1904 (H. Doc. No. 895); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the claims of Edgar Allan, jr., postmaster at Richmond, Va. (H. Doc. No. 894); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, acknowledging receipt of House resolution 578, in regard to high price of anthracite coal (H. Doc. No. 896); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolution were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 23627) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army, and to regulate promotions therein," approved October 1, 1890, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1126), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 3, 1912.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 893).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Attorney General, submitting an item for inclusion in the general deficiency appropriation bill authorizing the disbursing clerk of the Department of Justice to pay from the appropriation for "salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1912," the salary of Creighton M. Foraker for acting as United States marshal, and W. R. Forbes for acting as chief office deputy marshal, from January 7 to March 1, 1912, the interim being between the admission of the Territory of New Mexico to statehood and the appointment of a marshal by the court, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 103) directing the Secretary of State to investigate the claims of American citizens growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico, to determine the amounts due, if any, and to press them for payment.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. KERN presented a memorial of members of the Business Men's Association of Lebanon, Ind., remonstrating against the passage of the proposed parcel-post bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 606) for the relief of John Treffeisen, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1009) thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19190) for the relief of John P. Risley, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1010) thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the bill (S. 3315) to prohibit corporations from making contributions in connection with political elections and to limit the amount of such contributions by individuals or persons, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1011) thereon.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON HYGIENE AND DEMOGRAPHY.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 126) authorizing Federal bureaus doing hygienic and demographic work to participate in the exhibition to be held in connection with the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography, to be held at Washington, September 16 to October 4, 1912. I ask the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. After the joint resolution has been read, I will ask unanimous consent for its consideration. I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

A bill was introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 7419) increasing the limit of cost of the post-office building at St. Petersburg, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $55,000 for the protection of buildings and property of the United States at Valdez, Alaska, from glacial floods, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 23451) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims for damages to and loss of private property, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table.

THE JUDICIAL RECALL (S. DOC. NO. 892).

Mr. McCUMBER. I present an article on the judicial recall by Rome G. Brown, attorney at law of Minneapolis, containing also other references to this subject, which I consider very important. I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the paper, the nature of which he has stated, shall be printed as a public document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 25034. An act to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, more than six months ago I introduced a resolution (S. Res. 160) calling for an investigation of the soldiers' home at Los Angeles, Cal. The resolution was referred in the first instance to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I understand the committee referred the matter upon its merits to the Committee on Military Affairs. I understand also that it was referred to a subcommittee, and that that subcommittee some time ago made its report.

It is a matter which should be investigated now, if it is ever to be investigated. The conditions are such that I think there should be no delay with respect to it. The old soldiers in that home ought not to be allowed to live or die in the condition that, according to my information, exists at the soldiers' home.

I therefore inquire of the chairman, or any member of that committee who may be present, what the prospect is of having some report on the resolution, if any member of the committee here is prepared to answer.

Mr. WARREN. The chairman of the committee does not seem to be here. While I am the next ranking member I have not had my attention called to this matter. I am not on the subcommittee that has considered it, and I am unable to give the Senator any information. Possibly some other member of the committee may do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the resolution was referred to a subcommittee, but the subcommittee, as I understand it, has not yet reported to the full committee, but I think it is about ready to report. The matter was taken up and discussed by members of the subcommittee at a meeting of the full committee, I think the last meeting, and I believe at least one member of the subcommittee stated that they are practically ready to file a report with the full committee.

Mr. WORKS. I may have been misinformed as to the fact of the report having been made. I knew the subcommittee had agreed upon a report, and my information was that they had reported to the full committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. The subcommittee may have agreed on a report, but my recollection is that it has not yet made its report to the full committee.

Mr. WORKS. I bring the matter before the Senate more to attract the attention of members of the committee to it. In my judgment speedy action should be taken in respect to it, if any action is to be taken at all.

CONDITION OF MILL WORKERS AT LAWRENCE, MASS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, Mr. President, that 1,000 additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Labor on the Lawrence strike be ordered printed for the use of the Senate. (S. Doc. No. 870.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks that 1,000 extra copies of the report upon the Lawrence strike shall be printed for the use of the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator how many copies were printed. I have had some calls for it and have been unable to supply them. Was it a small edition?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There have been a vast number of calls, and I understand that only 200 copies were printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was informed at the document room that I had 2 copies to my credit. Of course, we ought to have more than that number. I have not examined the document, but I imagine that it is of sufficient merit to have a reasonable number printed. Perhaps 1,000 copies will be enough; I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. About 1,274 copies were printed, but I suppose that would give each Senator only 2 copies. The only reason why I bring this to the Senator's attention now is that if the additional copies cost more than $500, the printing will have to be ordered by a joint resolution. If the Senator will just give me a very little time I will find out what the additional copies would cost and bring it to his attention and agree to whatever number is necessary.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the printing of a thousand additional copies if the cost does not reach beyond the amount that under the law requires a joint resolution to cover it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What do I understand the Senator to state that the printing of the usual number cost?

Mr. SMOOT. It cost four thousand three hundred and some odd dollars. So it is my opinion that it will require a joint resolution to print the additional copies.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this conversation has been going on for about 10 minutes and I have not heard a word of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Washington to let the matter go over and we will see into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators complain that they do not hear what the Senators are saying.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know whether it is the fault of the Senator who does not hear or the fault of the Senator who is speaking. Perhaps it is the fault of the acoustic properties of the hall.

Mr. OVERMAN. The debate has been proceeding in a very low tone of conversation, and we on this side would like to know what is going on.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that the Senator from Washington requested that 1,000 additional copies of the public document referring to conditions at the mills at Lawrence should be printed. I have no objection to the printing of 1,000 extra copies or whatever number the Senate may desire, but I do believe that the cost of printing a thousand copies will be more than $500, and if so, a joint resolution of the two Houses will be required. I simply asked the Senator from Washington to let the matter go over until I could find out what 1,000 copies would cost and bring it to his attention, and then he can bring it before the Senate in the proper way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that I am informed by the Government Printing Office that the document is now about ready to be printed, and whatever number is going to be printed ought to be known now and the printer instructed, so that when the edition is printed he may print the proper number.

Mr. SMOOT. That is quite true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to make one further remark. If it requires a joint resolution of the Senate and House, the House will probably need and claim a portion of them and there ought to be, in that case, more than a thousand additional copies ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. They could amend the joint resolution to whatever number they might desire.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will give his attention to the matter of which he speaks promptly, so that the additional copies can be printed, I will not insist upon the motion now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will give the Senator the information within 15 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington withdraws the motion for the present.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] asked for an order to print 1,000 additional copies of the report on the Lawrence strike. I did not know at that time whether that number could be printed within the limit under the law. I find that it can be printed if ordered immediately with the first order. Therefore, I ask that 1,000 extra copies of Senate Document 870 be printed for the use of the document room.

Mr. POINDEXTER. While on this subject, I understood that over 1,200 copies had been printed before, and only 2 copies were distributed to each Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. They are distributed under the law, so many going to the libraries of the country and so many to each Representative and Senator. That is the way they are distributed whenever it is made a public document. In this order I understand that the Senator desires to have the copies for the use of the Senate, and therefore I made the request that it be printed as a Senate document.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,000 additional copies of Senate Document 870, being the report on the Lawrence strike, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

THE METAL SCHEDULE.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it is quite important, in order to facilitate the meetings of conferees on other tariff bills, that the conference report on the metal bill should be submitted to the Senate. I understand that this course meets the approval of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bacon	Fletcher	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.

Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Reed	Watson
Crawford	McCumber	Sanders	Works
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Shively

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably detained on official business, and that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] is unavoidably detained from the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate 51 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, with Senate amendments, having met, after full and free conference have decided to report and do report to their respective Houses as follows:

That the conferees have been unable to agree on amendments numbered 3 and 4.

BOIES PENROSE,
H. C. LODGE,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
A. MITCHELL PALMER,
SERENO PAYNE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate recede from its amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. That same suggestion has been recently made, and the roll called.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that; but I think the Senator will agree that there are very few on this side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Bacon	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Guggenheim	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Swanson
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Burton	Jones	Poindexter	Tillman
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Townsend
Clapp	La Follette	Reed	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Sanders	Watson
Crane	McCumber	Shively

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON], on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 55 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota rise to this question?

Mr. GRONNA. I rise to this particular question. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend until the Chair states the pending question to the Senate. The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that the Senate recede from its amendments. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from North Dakota will permit me——

Mr. SIMMONS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to inquire whether my motion to recede should be preceded by a motion to agree to the conference report, which is a report to the Senate of the disagreement on the part of the conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it does not have to be preceded by such a motion, but if there is a precedent to the contrary the Chair is ready to conform to it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] will permit me one moment, for the information of the Senate, as it has been, I believe, nearly two months since this bill passed the Senate, I will state that the question now before the Senate is that the Senate should recede from the amendment repealing what is known as the reciprocity bill, which was attached to the metal bill by the Senate. In the numerous tariff transactions which have occurred since the metal bill was passed, I think it well to remind the Senate of the exact status of this particular measure. The question is on the Senate receding from the amendment repealing the reciprocity act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania correctly states the question. If it is desired, the amendment from which it is proposed to recede will be read to the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I ought to say, Mr. President, that the second amendment in disagreement is merely the numbering of a paragraph, the introduction of the amendment repealing the reciprocity act having required a change in the numbering of the paragraphs.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate this morning for any considerable length of time, but I do wish to know what is intended by Senators on the other side of the Chamber so far as the reciprocity amendment is concerned. I understand that the purpose is to move that the Senate recede from its amendment providing for the repeal of the reciprocity act. I should like to know what opportunity there will be, or if there will be any opportunity, to have the measure reported by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], repealing the reciprocity act, taken up and passed during this session. I am not stating it as a fact, but I apprehend, Mr. President, that the amendment providing for the repeal of the reciprocity act will be retained on such bills as the President is sure to veto. I never offered the reciprocity amendment to any bill for the purpose of defeating the bill. I am interested in the measure itself and to help, so far as I am able, to do justice to the struggling millions in this country.

You may think you can fool the American farmer, but I want to say to you that you can not. Are we to eliminate the reciprocity amendment from all such bills as by a possibility the President might approve, and leave it on a measure the President is sure to veto?

I do not know whether I have a right to ask the question or not, and if I do not have the right I shall be glad to withdraw it, but I should like to know from Senators on the other side of the Chamber, and especially from the Senator having this bill in charge, what opportunity, if any, will be afforded to pass as an independent measure the bill providing for the repeal of the reciprocity act?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. In reply to the inquiry of the Senator from North Dakota, with respect to some independent measure dealing with the repeal of the reciprocity act, I can only say to him that I myself have not any knowledge of the attitude of Senators on this side of the Chamber with reference to the measure to which he refers. I understand that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has reported a bill of that character, but what opportunity will be afforded to vote upon that bill and what will be the attitude of this side of Chamber with reference to it, I am not authorized to say.

The Senator has just stated that it is proposed to retain the amendment repealing the reciprocity act upon a bill which the President would be sure to veto. Mr. President, two of the tariff bills which have been passed had attached to them this amendment to repeal the reciprocity act. One is the bill now before the Senate, known as the metal bill, and the other is the excise bill. The Senator has expressed the opinion, as I understood him, that the President would veto the excise bill. I do not know what the President will do in reference to that bill; but has the Senator any reason to suppose that the President is more likely to veto the excise bill than he is to veto the metal bill now under consideration? The statement has been made by Senators on the other side, professing to speak for the President, that the President has already made up his mind and has probably notified the steel producers and manufacturers of this country, that if the metal bill were sent to him he would veto it. That is not a part of our business, however. I am simply answering the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator specify any Senator on this side who has made a declaration of that kind?

Mr. SIMMONS. I could do so, but I do not care to.

Mr. GALLINGER. It must have been in private conversation.

Mr. SIMMONS. For that reason I decline to give the name of any Senator who has spoken to me in reference to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to put in the RECORD the fact that no such declaration has ever been made on the floor of the Senate on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. No such declaration has been made on the floor of the Senate, and I have not said that any such declaration has been made on the floor of the Senate; but I was advised yesterday—I am not now speaking about any conversation I have had with Senators on the other side about this matter—but I was advised yesterday by a newspaper man that the President had authorized the statement to be made to the manufacturers of Pennsylvania that he would veto it and that they could rely upon his doing so. That is a mere rumor, and I am not vouching for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. A mere newspaper statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I can assure the Senator with respect to this matter is that there will be action on the part of the conferees upon the excise bill. The conferees have been appointed; they have had a preliminary conference, and they will on Monday or Tuesday meet and act. I can assure the Senator that when that bill comes before the Senate—and it will come before the Senate as it will come before the House, and I think I can say it will be acted upon by the House and by the Senate, and when that action is taken the Senator will have an opportunity to vote for the repeal of at least a part of the reciprocity act, that part in which the Senator is interested and in which the millions of farmers for whom he says he is speaking are interested. I can give the Senator that assurance, but further than that I am unable to go.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his frank statement. I have no right to speak for nor do I propose to speak for the President of the United States. I do not know what he intends to do, but I have a right to my opinion as to what he will do. I believe the reciprocity act should be repealed, and believe the Democrats should face that proposition the same as they should face every other question, unafraid and frankly. I do not believe that Democrats can hope to be successful at the polls by passing bills, or by refusing to repeal an act that discriminates against the many in the interest of a few—in the interest of corporations, which are absolutely in control of the great industries of this country.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Can the Senator from North Dakota imagine any reason which would render a provision repealing the reciprocity act objectionable on the metal bill and not objectionable on the excise bill? If it is a good amendment to the excise bill, why is it not a good amendment to the metal bill?

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, I would much prefer to see the amendment on the sugar bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me, the question suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania is the same question I asked quite a number of Republican Senators who voted against an amendment repealing the reciprocity act the other day in connection with another bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I know my colleague offered such an amendment and I voted for the amendment, as the RECORD will show. I am extremely anxious, Mr. President, to see the reciprocity act repealed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. While I was on my feet a moment ago I should have made an additional statement, but I will make it now to the Senator. It is this: If the conferees should agree, as I am sure they will, to report the excise bill, Senators on this side of the Chamber will join the Senator from North Dakota in repealing that part of the reciprocity act which has not up to this time gone into effect because of the nonaction of Canada.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator assures me that the Members on the other side of the Chamber will place such a provision——

Mr. SIMMONS. I meant on the excise bill. If I said the steel bill, I meant the excise bill——

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator also assures me that the Senators in this Chamber will to the best of their ability exert every influence on the House to see that it passes that body.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can speak only for the Senators on this side of the Chamber, and I have undertaken to speak for them because I have authority conferred upon me to do that. But, of course, I can not give the Senator any assurance with reference to the action of the House. I can express to the Senator an opinion, and that opinion is that the majority of the House will concur in the repeal of that part. I may be mistaken about that. I only express the opinion which a Senator, who, having interested himself in this matter, might properly entertain and with propriety, I think, express.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, when I rose this morning it was with the hope that I could prevail upon some member of the Finance Committee to call up this measure this morning and that the Senate would give unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of an independent measure providing for the repeal of the reciprocity act.

As I have said before, I do not know that the President will veto these bills if they are agreed to here, but I have reason to believe that he will not approve all of them. We are very much interested in this measure, and there are interested in it a great number of people in the United States, the farmers all over this country, 35,000,000 people, who depend upon the agricultural industry for their comfort and for their living, and it means more than any mere political policy. It means doing justice to a great number of American citizens.

I have on every occasion, by my vote and otherwise, tried to have this iniquitous measure repealed. If the reports in the papers are true, even the President of the United States now realizes that it was a mistake to pass it. But I can readily see that it will afford an excuse for vetoing reciprocity on these tariff bills if the rates of duty are too low, if they are lower than the rates such as are advocated, not by the President of the United States, but the Republican Party of this country.

I again want to ask the Senator from North Carolina if it will not be possible to come to some agreement and have some understanding that this independent measure shall be taken up and passed not only in this body but in the other body, providing the paper provision is eliminated.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not understand the latter part of the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. GRONNA. The question I propounded to the Senator from North Carolina is whether it is not possible to come to some agreement or to have some understanding that we shall take up this measure as an independent measure, or agree on some particular time when this measure shall be taken up and passed at least in this body, providing we eliminate the provision that is objectionable to the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. As far as I can answer the inquiry of the Senator, I will say that I know of no disposition on the part of this side of the Chamber to interfere or obstruct in any way the consideration of such a measure as he refers to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. Just a moment, if the Senator from North Dakota pleases.

I could not, of course, indicate to the Senator what action the other side of the Chamber would take upon a measure of that sort. I can only say I am satisfied there is no disposition over here, and there will be none, to interfere with the speedy consideration of a measure of that character.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will my colleague allow me to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. GRONNA. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina how under the Constitution we will be able to take up this measure and originate it in the Senate—a measure which affects the raising of revenue?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, Mr. President, I was not considering that phase of it. Of course, the Senate could not take the initiative in the matter. It is a matter affecting the revenues, and would repeal a revenue act, and, of course, it would have to come to us from the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. As a matter of fact, we would not have any control over it unless it was introduced in the House and sent over from there to us. So it is idle to discuss that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will understand I was not discussing that phase of the proposition.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand the House conferees ask the Senate to recede from our action placing this provision on this tariff bill. I take it the strong opposition comes from the Members of the House, and for that reason I had the right to ask the Senator from North Carolina and all the Senators on the other side of the Chamber when this opposition would cease.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I will say I think if the plan I have indicated, as the result of the probable action of the House with reference to the amendment as it is on the excise bill, is followed, he will accomplish what he wants; but if the Senator insists upon and shall be able to defeat that, he will accomplish nothing in the direction he desires to go.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like to state what I understand to be the position of the Senator from North Carolina; and I would be glad to be corrected by the Senator if I am wrong.

I understand his position to be this: We have on the statute books a law to give effect to a tentative agreement with Canada for modifications of the tariff laws of the two countries. That agreement has been rejected by Canada, and our statute as it now stands amounts to a continuing authority to the Parliament of Canada to pass a tariff bill for the United States whenever it sees fit to do so.

Many of us believe—and I am one of them—that that authority ought not to continue; that the rejection of the agreement by Canada should be deemed an end of the offer by the United States, and that our statutes should be made to show that the offer was ended by the rejection.

The statute which it is necessary to repeal in order to revoke that authority to the Parliament of Canada to make a tariff law for us in a revenue measure, and the repeal can be accomplished in only one of two ways. One is by the origination of an independent bill in the House of Representatives. The other is by attaching an amendment here to a bill coming from the House of Representatives, and an amendment to a revenue bill, to which it would be germane.

The Senator from North Dakota, desiring that this authority to the Canadian Parliament shall be repealed, has offered to revenue measures coming to the Senate from the House of Representatives amendments repealing the statute which gives the authority.

Now, I understand the position of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to be that he is willing to have such an amendment attached to any bill which he believes can never become a law, but he is unwilling to have it attached to any bill which he thinks may become a law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has——

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from New York has misstated altogether my position. The Senator was probably not here when I made my first statement. I said in my first statement, speaking about the metal bill, which is now before the Senate and to which this amendment has been attached, and from which I am asking that it be detached, would be, in my opinion, basing that opinion upon statements which have been made to me by those who I think have some authority to speak, vetoed by the President. I shall regret exceedingly if the President shall see fit to veto it, but——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a moment, does the Senator mean the metal bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the metal bill and only the metal bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. What harm will it do to let this amendment stay on if the bill is going to be vetoed?

Mr. SIMMONS. We want to perfect the bill before it reaches the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from North Carolina is anxious, as I am sure he is, to have this bill passed and become a law; and if it be true, as has been reported in the newspapers, that the President of the United States now would be glad to see that measure repealed, would it not stand a better chance of receiving the approval of the President with a reciprocity repeal on it than by taking it off?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not answer, with reference to that question, whether it would or would not. I do not know the present attitude of the President of the United States with reference to reciprocity. I do not know whether he has changed front somewhat on that question, as those who seem to speak for the administration on the other side of the Chamber have changed on that question.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator himself has changed.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken when he says I have changed front on that question.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe, if I may be pardoned for making the statement, that the President would be glad to have an opportunity of approving a measure to repeal the reciprocity law. Now, entertaining at least the hope that he would do so, it seems to me, Mr. President, as the Senators on the other side of the Chamber say they do not now object, at least to repealing a part of this provision, they should welcome something on these tariff bills that might perhaps to some extent be an inducement for the President to approve of their tariff bills.

I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer. To the farmers of the United States, not only of North Dakota farmers, but to the farmers as a whole, this law is objectionable. The farmer who says he approves of a measure of this kind does not know that if we fail to repeal it Canada can at any time accept it; it will injure him, and that it will continue to be a disadvantage to him, and that in the future, until it shall have been repealed, it will reduce the prices of his products. For that reason, and for no other, I want to have it repealed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from North Carolina this question: Has the Senator any information or belief that if this reciprocity repeal clause were attached to this metal schedule bill it would be vetoed by the President because it was so attached?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the reciprocity repeal were attached to it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. Does that endanger the bill in the hands of the President?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have stated that I do not know what the attitude of the President may be in reference to that matter. His attitude has changed very frequently upon various and sundry public questions. It may be that the President, who at the last session of Congress was such an ardent advocate of reciprocity, seeing that it is so very unpopular with a large and influential and in many States a controlling element of the electorate, may have changed his position in order to meet the present political exigencies of his candidacy: and it may be that, reversing that position, he would sign a bill repealing reciprocity, but——

Mr. McCUMBER. Then the Senator's conclusion is that the President would sign it?

Mr. SIMMONS. But I have no authority to say that; and I have no reason, from anything the President has said which has come to me, to know, or to predict even, what the President would do about that matter. I presume, however, that there are Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have conferred with him. I have seen in the newspapers the statement that certain Senators and probably Representatives have been requested by the President to express to him their views about this question. Those Senators who have enjoyed the President's confidence in this matter may be able to enlighten the Senator from North Dakota as to the present attitude of the President with reference to this pet measure of his.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I wanted to arrive at was whether the Senator had any fear about the signature of the President being placed to this bill, if it should pass both Houses, because of the reciprocity clause being attached thereto. From what the Senator says I understand that he has no such fear. I also understand that the Senator now believes that probably the Democratic Party would be in favor of the repeal of this offer to Canada so far as it now remains upon the statute books. If that is the case, and if there is no fear of the President, and the sentiment of the other side is in favor of the repeal, let me ask the Senator what objection, then, can there possibly be to allowing this amendment to remain as a part of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that matter has not been considered by the conferees. That matter has not been considered by me in connection with my associates on this side. All I am able to answer the Senator is that the conferees have reported upon this matter disagreeing to the amendment, and I have made the motion that the Senate recede from its amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not for myself understand the position of the other side. I can not understand why that side voted almost solidly against placing this same clause upon the sugar bill. They had reason to believe that probably the sugar bill would be signed. They had no reason to believe that the President would refuse to sign it because that provision was attached. Then it has the appearance to me to be about like this: That the other side are willing to attach this provision to any bill which they believe will not be signed by the President——

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask——

Mr. McCUMBER. And while professing a friendship for the repeal they are opposed to attaching it to any bill that will probably be signed by the President.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The sugar bill was a bill which was finally agreed upon——

Mr. McCUMBER. I confess I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say when we were considering the sugar bill, brought to us from the House, the other side of the Chamber got together upon an amendment to that bill making a very slight reduction in the duties on sugar. That would go to the President as a Republican bill. That side of the Chamber, I understand, expect it to become a law. They expect it, if it meets the approval of the House of Representatives as it has of the Senate, to go to the President and be signed by the President. When we were considering that bill, as I remember it, the Senators on the other side of the Chamber of both factions of the Republican Party voted solidly, or with practical solidity if not solidly, against attaching the reciprocity amendment to that bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, the Senator is mistaken. The majority of the votes on this side of the Chamber were in favor of so attaching it.

Mr. GALLINGER. A large majority.

Mr. McCUMBER. A very large majority. The Senator and all his colleagues who voted the other way——

Mr. SIMMONS. My impression is the other way. The vote was—yeas 21, nays 34. The nays were:

Messrs. Borah, Bourne, Bristow, Bryan, Burton, Catron, Crane, Crawford, Cummins, Dillingham, Fall, Foster, Gallinger, Gronna, Heyburn, Johnson of Maine, Jones, Lodge, McCumber, McLean, Massey, Page, Penrose, Perkins, Root, Sanders, Smith of Michigan, Smoot, Stephenson, Sutherland, Thornton, Townsend, Warren, and Williams.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am reading what I suppose to be the vote on that amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a violent supposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was handed to me by the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. McCUMBER. That was not the vote on the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was handed to me by the Senator from Maine, and I assumed that he had examined it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is reading the wrong vote; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was on the Bacon amendment, the Senator from Maine advises me. On the other page is the vote on the amendment to which I refer. The yeas were 24 and the nays were 31.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the mendment offered by myself?

Mr. SIMMONS. On the amendment offered by yourself. I was mistaken when I said that there was unanimity. There were a part of the Republicans voting against attaching it. I will read it, if the Senator desires me. The nays were:

Messrs. Ashurst, Bacon, Bankhead, Bourne, Bristow, Bryan, Chamberlain, Crawford, Cummins, Fall, Fletcher, Hitchcock, Johnston of Alabama, Lodge, McLean, Martine of New Jersey, Myers, Newlands, Overman, Poindexter, Pomerene, Reed, Root, Shively, Simmons, Smith of Arizona, Sutherland, Swanson, Watson, Williams, and Works.

Mr. McCUMBER. Every Democrat, with the exception of probably one or two—and I do not know but that every one—voted against placing that amendment upon the sugar-schedule bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, what I desire to ask——

Mr. McCUMBER. A few Republicans voted the same way, and with the combination between the two they defeated the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I notice that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was the author of the bill, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who was the author of the amendment which was accepted to the bill, voted against attaching that amendment to the sugar bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. They voted that way for a certain reason, and I can give the reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what they did it for, but I assumed at the time, and it was assumed on this side of the Chamber at the time, that they did it because of their apprehension that the President might on that account veto that bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think everyone of them would deny that proposition. They did it upon the apprehension that the Democratic House might possibly not pass it, that the Democratic Party would not agree to it. That was the reason, not through any fear of the President's veto, but through the fear of the veto of the Democratic majority in the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if he is authorized to say to the Chamber that the President would not veto it on account of this amendment or that he would not permit the amendment if attached to influence his action in the premises?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, I could answer that by asking another question of the Senator, as to whether he is authorized to say that the President would not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no authority to speak for the President. The President does represent the party of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has indicated his belief that the President would sign it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not indicated that at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am perfectly willing to say that I believe he would sign the bill with that amendment attached.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from North Dakota entirely misrepresents what I have stated. I have stated nothing upon which the Senator could infer that I have entertained any opinion with reference to what action the President would take on account of the attachment of this amendment to this bill. I have no opinion about it and I have expressed no opinion about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought that the Senator in his quite lengthy answer to my question——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator assumed I have that opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Expressed an opinion after drawing certain conclusions. From the fact of Senators having seen the President and from the fact that a great many Republicans were opposed to this reciprocity proposition the Senator gave it not as his opinion, but indicated that probably the President would sign now a bill that contained this repeal. He did not give it as his opinion, but put it in such words that anyone could draw the conclusion that the Senator did believe the President would not refuse his signature because this proviso should be attached.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator did not hear me say anything which would justify in the slightest that inference. The Senator is speaking about the invitation that I extended to the other side, to those Senators who are said in the newspaper prints to have been in conference with the President about this matter, to rise in their seats now and enlighten the Senate and the country as to what is the President's view in the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can bring that argument to a focus very quickly. If the Senator has no opinion one way or the other, then he has no justification for the assumption that the President will not sign it, and having no justification for an assumption of that kind, there is no reason why he should oppose this proposition being attached to the bill. If I believed it ought to be repealed, then I would put it upon a bill that would go to the President and allow him to exercise his judgment upon it, and that is all we are asking on this side.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if the Senate has honored me by paying the slightest attention in the past to my position on the subject of the Canadian reciprocity treaty, its Members must know of my intense opposition to that measure. For reasons which I have stated before on this floor and do not deem it necessary to restate now, from the standpoint of principle, the bill is to me particularly odious. Yet I am going to vote on the pending question with my fellow Democrats; but I wish it to be very distinctly understood that in doing so I do not relax any of my opposition to the Canadian reciprocity bill. However, I do feel justified in believing that my act in this matter will assist toward the ultimate repeal of the reciprocity bill, and for that reason I feel justified in taking the action that I will this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], that the Senate recede from its amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not in the Chamber, I withhold my vote. If he were present and I were free to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] has a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. So that we may both vote, I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has a pair with my colleague, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and I have a pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to my colleague [Mr. OLIVER], which will permit the Senator from Oregon and myself to vote. He having already voted, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when Mr. RICHARDSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON] is absent from the city. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. STEPHENSON's name was called). I desire to announce the absence from the city of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. He has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from Wisconsin were present and free to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were free to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], but under the double transfer as stated by the Senator from North Dakota I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay." I desire also to announce that my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] is unavoidably absent. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present and free to vote, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and will let my vote stand. While I am on my feet I desire to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is not in the city. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair existing between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. WATSON. In announcing the absence and pair of my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] I desire to say that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 28, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. SIMMONS was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill stands passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina obtained the floor.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] to yield for the consideration of the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 24023). It is exceedingly important that it should be acted upon and disposed of as early to-day as possible. As the Senator from South Carolina has the floor I ask whether he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have no objection to yielding the floor for that purpose, with the understanding that I will resume it as soon as that matter is disposed of, if that is agreeable to the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in charge of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. BOURNE. It is perfectly agreeable to me, Mr. President. I realize the importance of the request of the Senator from Wyoming, and, with the consent of the Senator from South Carolina, I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. WARREN. Then, I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The report has been printed in the RECORD, and has also been printed as a separate document, which has been distributed and is on Senators' desks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator from Iowa begins to speak I should like to make a brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. For the information of the Senate I desire merely to make a brief statement. I was a member of the conference committee. The Senate attached an amendment to the legislative, and so forth, appropriation bill abolishing the judges of the Commerce Court. From some remarks made upon the floor yesterday it seems that an impression prevails in some quarters that the Senate conferees are responsible for the amendment of the Senate abolishing the Commerce Court judges being disagreed to. I think it is due the Senate to state that the Senate conferees insisted all the time upon the amendment of the Senate abolishing those judges. It was very evident, just as soon as we went into conference, that the House conferees would not agree to the Senate amendment. About the last action taken by the conferees on the part of the Senate was to recede from our amendment, but we had to do so in order to reach an agreement. One of the conferees and myself took the position, which I think is the right position to take, that wherever the Senate after long debate puts an amendment of that kind upon a bill, the conferees on the part of the Senate ought not to yield at all, but should report the matter back to the Senate for instructions from the Senate as to how to act; but after being in conference for weeks and weeks it looked as though we could not get an agreement, and the Senate conferees finally had to yield to the House, and they gave up the amendment only after a long and strenuous attempt to secure the adoption of the Senate provision. We tried to get the conferees on the part of the House to agree to the Senate amendment, but they would not do so. Therefore we finally were compelled to yield. I think I state the situation correctly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator has stated the situation exactly right, with one possible exception. He speaks of two of the Senate conferees insisting. As a matter of fact, there was no difference on that question on the part of the Senate conferees, and it was decided very early that if we must come back to the Senate with any amendments in disagreement that amendment should be included.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is correct.

Mr. WARREN. We had no dfferences in regard to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think there really was any difference, but I think that two of the conferees were very strenuous in the position that this matter ought to be reported back to the Senate before we agreed to the House provision and receded from the Senate amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator—perhaps he overlooked it—that when the observation was made yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that we had saved the court my reply corrected him, as per the following in the RECORD:

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. In answer to the inquiry about the Commerce Court, I said that the Senate receded from its proposition to abolish five circuit judges. The Senate amendment providing for a transfer of the business of the Commerce Court to the district courts was agreed to with an amendment perfecting it.

Mr. REED. In other words, as this bill is now reported the Commerce Court is retained.

Mr. WARREN. No; there is no Commerce Court; that was done away with by the action of both the other House and the Senate before the bill was sent to conference. The only difference is that there are now 34 circuit judges, and there will be no new ones appointed until the number is reduced to 29, if this bill as now reported becomes a law.

Mr. REED. In other words, the five judges of the Commerce Court keep their offices as judges and continue to draw their salaries?

Mr. WARREN. As circuit judges.

Mr. REED. And then no more circuit judges are to be appointed until the number is reduced to 29?

Mr. WARREN. Not until the number is reduced to 29.

Mr. REED. The Senate succeeded in saving the salary of the judges?

Mr. WARREN. No; on the contrary, the Senate was obliged to recede from its proposition to discharge five judges on the demand of the House conferees. There are no appropriations for the Commerce Court; and there will be no Commerce Court under the bill.

In the newspapers of this morning it is stated that the conferees agreed to do away with the Commerce Court. As a matter of fact, the action of the House and the Senate together had already done away with the Commerce Court before the bill went to conference. All that was before us was with relation to the judges of whom the Senator has spoken and the procedure by which the business of the Commerce Court should be transferred to other courts, and I so stated yesterday.

Mr. OVERMAN. The reason I make this statement, if the Senator from Wyoming will excuse me a moment, is because of a remark made by the Senator from Missouri, which he has kindly corrected in the RECORD. I understood him to say that the Senate conferees had succeeded in saving the salaries of five judges. I wanted him to understand that we had yielded only after a very strenuous opposition on the part of the other House, finding that we could not agree without yielding.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the subject that I was about to bring to the attention of the Senate first does not relate to the Commerce Court, but it relates to the civil service of the United States. The effect of the bill agreed upon by the conferees would be to abolish the civil service as we understand it. We might as well face the proposition squarely and consider what we shall do with it. The proposition is to appoint for terms of seven years, and at the end of seven years the reappointment is to be absolutely at the discretion of the head of the department. The only rule which is laid down for the guidance of the head of the department is that the employee in order to be eligible must have reached a certain standard of efficiency in his previous work. No matter how efficient he may be and how high he may have risen above the standard, his appointment is at the pleasure of the head of the department. It restores the old spoils system in all its completeness. The only difference is that the spoils are to be distributed at periods of seven years instead of periods of change of administration.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator intends to befog us with a misstatement, and he surely will admit that that statement is incorrect.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not admit that it is incorrect. I do not intend to misrepresent anything.

Mr. WARREN. I know the Senator has no such intention; so I think I can correct the statement he has made. I do not rise to say that this plan is mine, nor is that of the Senate conferees, but it is here as the best we could do. I will add that the more you consider it the better it looks. The Senator says that it restores entirely, as a whole, the spoils system.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does.

Mr. WARREN. We shall follow that up a moment: At the end of seven years or eight years, as the case may be, all these employees end their service. What follows? The head of the department can reappoint every one of them who has not fallen below the grade that calls for his dismissal. How will he fill a particular place if he does not reappoint the old employee? There is where the rub comes. Formerly, all he had to do was to employ whom he might choose. There were no civil-service restrictions to control him, as now. Under this proposed law he can not employ a man or a woman except through the civil service. The most he could possibly do would be to refuse to reappoint the old employee, and call for new certifications from the civil service, but the civil service has just as closely in its grasp every place that is now in the classified service as it had before, because whenever one goes out, the one who follows must come from the civil service.

Now let us look at the matter reasonably for a moment: If the Senator himself, without regard to his politics, or any other Senator, were the head of a department, and had a corps of clerks and at a time, we will say, one-half——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We over here can not hear the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I thought I was talking loud enough.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator was facing the other way.

Mr. WARREN. Suppose it comes to the end of the term of appointment. I want to know what man, applying it to himself or his place, would say, "Get out, all of you clerks. You are all efficient and trained clerks of experience in my department, but I do not know your politics and I want somebody else." How is he going to get somebody else? All he can do is to send his requisition to the Civil Service Commission and have others certified without regard to politics—others unknown to him and without experience. What is he going to do? Reappoint his employees who are all right or enter upon a sea of uncertainty? He will reappoint them, of course.

So that the proposition that this does away with the civil-service jurisdiction and restores the old spoils system is not correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to ask a question at this point, and I will address it to the Senator from Wyoming. If it is reasonably certain that the head of a department would retain in the service such of the employees as had reached the required standard, why then should he not be required to retain in the service such employees? Why throw the whole list open to reappointment when the scale of markings ought to guarantee on the ground of efficiency retention in the service?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to reply, if I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is too much audible conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to reply, if I may have a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. That question and many others have come up. I may as well say here what I shall have to say on the subject at some time.

We are confronted with propositions such as we have never before been confronted with in my service. We have before us appropriation bills coming over from the other side that are filled with legislation. The House has adopted rules that make these legislative items strictly within the rule. The House is a coordinate branch of the Government. We meet its Members in conference. We struggle day after day, night after night, week after week, and in some cases month after month, and it has been impossible to get any one of these appropriation bills through that had legislation in it without conforming in some degree to that proposed legislation.

Now, appearing as I do as one of the managers of the conference, it is incumbent upon me, of course, to state what I believe about the results that we present here; but as to this legislation being in the bills and as to its not suiting all of the Senators here, I do not feel that we are responsible.

I observed, as all Senators did, when this matter was up before, that on both sides of the Chamber there seemed to be many Senators who thought there ought to be some term of renewal of service.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. And may I say one word more, that both of these sections as they appear here came from civil-service commissioners, and nothing has been added to or taken from them except to the one we added what had been presented in the other, as to soldiers and sailors.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask a question at this point? I should like to know if the Civil Service Commission recommended a limited term.

Mr. WARREN. I do not at this moment have it here, but I will later call attention to a letter from the chairman of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the personal expression of the chairman of the board. It is not the opinion of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WARREN. So far as I know—of course I can not speak for the Civil Service Board——

Mr. CUMMINS. I venture to say that the letter does not attempt to speak for the commission.

Mr. WARREN. We asked for the representatives of that board, and we were visited by the acting chairman of the board before we reported the bill to the Senate, and the result of that meeting was the section we put in. Since that time there has come a letter from the chairman of the board, which, like the first one, was not on the assumption that it was by the board as an official document. The first one was sent in by Mr. McIlhenny; the last one was sent by the chief of the board, Gen. Black. Neither one of them stated it was or was not the united action of the board. The members of the board may be, as we are, of different opinions, or they may be united; I can not attempt to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. He also says——

Mr. CUMMINS. I want a little order preserved during my speech.

Mr. WARREN. But the fact remains that we have those proposition to deal with. We can not avoid it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I just want to ask the Senator along that line, did Mr. Washburn agree to the plan?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I heard a letter read in the committee room, and that was from Gen. Black. Is not Mr. Washburn a member of the commission?

Mr. WARREN. I have not met him. I do not know. I do not know what his opinions are.

Mr. OVERMAN. The letter should be read.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Wyoming will produce the letter, which I have never seen and of which I never heard before, I believe it will appear it was written by Gen. Black and not for and on behalf of the commission. I know——

Mr. WARREN. I stated that neither one of these appeared in the form of coming from the organized board as such.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator from Wyoming ought not to say that this is the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. I believe I know that at least two members of the commission are very much opposed to introducing this idea of a term with a discretion in the head of the department to reemploy or not at the end of that term, irrespective of the standing of the employee in the service.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming until he shall have finished.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has yielded to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I have only a word to say, and then I shall yield.

I do not want to be misunderstood. I undertake to state, and I state again, that we asked the opinion of the board, but were unable to get it, because some of its members were absent from the city or ill, and we got from Mr. McIlhenny what I understood him to mean was a substitute for section 5. We struck out section 5 and put in the other and numbered it section 4, and the debate ensued here when the bill was on its passage over that and also over section 5.

In conference a statement was made as to Mr. Black's position, he having returned or recovered, if he had been ill, and this letter was exhibited as his opinion. I do not believe it states whether it is the opinion of anybody else. I have not attempted to state that I had the board appear in full before the committee. I do not know anything about the other member.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield now to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question, if the Senator will answer. Does not this measure, as you finally leave it, give the Secretary a discretion to drop even proficient clerks if he sees fit?

Mr. WARREN. What Secretary?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the plain reading of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The head of the bureau can undoubtedly at the end of that time refuse to reemploy all of those clerks, but——

Mr. CUMMINS. He can refuse to employ any of the clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose he was a politician; could he not retain those who are his partisan followers, who are efficient, and drop all those who belong to the other party, if he saw fit?

Mr. WARREN. One moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator can answer it yes or no.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know whether the time has come in the United States Senate when one Senator can say to another that he shall answer a question by saying "yes" or "no," and stop there. I am not sure that time has come.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The time does not seem to have come when he will answer "yes" or "no," whether he can or not.

Mr. WARREN. I will say this: He has no power to select partisans for his office.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not ask that question at all.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me, in relation to that, how is the Secretary going to employ partisans or select partisans when the civil service prevents it, when every clerk he obtains must come from civil-service lists and under civil-service regulations? And so it is idle to say the old spoils system is restored through this proposed law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not ask the Senator that question at all. I understand perfectly that he must go back to the civil service to get new clerks. I asked the Senator the direct question, Does this measure leave with the Secretary the privilege of picking his partisan friends and dropping those belonging to the other party if he sees fit, although they have made splendid records?

Mr. WARREN. I understand that it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that I can not force the Senator from Wyoming to answer "yes" or "no," but I insist that this is just what this amendment does.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I insist on order. The Senator from Georgia is entirely right. That is just what it does, and I think that is just what it was intended to do.

I want to straighten up this matter of the relation of the members of the Civil Service Commission.

I know there are differences of opinion in regard to this, and I have reasons to believe that one member of the commission is in harmony with the action of the House originally and now the action of the managers, but if I understand the Senator from Wyoming correctly no other member of the commission proposed what is contained in section 4. That is the amendment which was originally reported to the Senate by the committee. That does not contain any such provision as is now found in the conference report. On the contrary, while there may be some objections to it it is a substantial continuance of the present system. Now, the other member of the commission, I know, is opposed to any such change as is here proposed.

Now let us see. I want to get back to my original statement that this was the spoils system over again. Let us see what will happen. At the end of seven years—and, of course, with twenty-two or twenty-three thousand classified employees in the District of Columbia, the seven years will come to a great many of them at the same time—at the end of seven years, no matter how high the rating of the employees, no matter how efficient they may have been, the head of the department or the Secretary is at liberty to disregard everything which they may have done, their whole record, and go to the civil-service register for the new employees.

It is not difficult to secure admission to the civil-service register. The examinations are not such as to preclude men and women of ordinary attainments from being placed on the register. They are of all political parties, and, of course, with the great number of clerks that are turned out all the time, their terms having expired, the heads of departments can select under the influence of their political friends in Congress or under the influence of their political friends elsewhere just such people from the civil-service register as they may desire to favor.

Therefore I state that we are here abolishing practically, and as I think completely, the whole civil-service idea, because I regard the right of continuance, if there is efficiency and competency in the employee, as even more important than the merit disclosed by competitive examination.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand the Senator correctly, that he maintains that at the end of the seven-year period Senators and Members of the House could go to the Civil Service Commission and have their own partisan friends appointed to positions in the departments?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what the Senator from North Carolina would do. He might be strong enough to resist that temptation.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator did not understand——

Mr. CUMMINS. I say there is opportunity for that.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I want to know—and I am not very well acquainted with the civil service, I confess—is if it is possible.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the law?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is if this law is adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know if it is now.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is possible for Senators and Members of the House to use their influence to secure promotions and demotions.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish that were excluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I know it is possible, and I know it is done.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it possible to-day for any Senator or Member of this House, by reason of his influence, to have any man on the civil-service register appointed to an office?

Mr. CUMMINS. If this report is adopted——

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is possible.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator, under the law as it is now, can they do it?

Mr. CUMMINS. They can not.

Mr. OVERMAN. How does this change the law?

Mr. CUMMINS. The law now is that if the head of a department wants an employee there are three men, the three highest men, certified to the head of the department. He may reject those and require other certifications. There are, of course, very few vacancies; the vacancies come rarely, and therefore there is no opportunity for the influence which I have described. But suppose there were 5,000 employees in the District of Columbia turned out within a month, and you recur to the civil-service register in order to supply their places. Then, of course, there is the opportunity, and the full opportunity, that I have suggested.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand this does not change the law, that in case of a vacancy, even if there were 5,000 vacancies, the Civil Service Commission should send up three names on its register, and in doing that it must consider the number of employees and their prorating as between the States. The law is not changed in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I will give the Senator a direct illustration of the effect.

Under the law creating the census, as the appropriations were expended it was necessary to make continuous reductions in the force. The reductions could not be avoided; they had to be made. Every time a reduction was made—I do not know how it was with other Senators, but I do not believe their experience differs from mine—we were harassed to go down there and urge the head of the census to keep this person or that person and let somebody else go.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that is true.

Mr. LODGE. The mere fact that there was that dropping, required by the failure of appropriations, gave the opportunity for selection among those who should be kept and those who should be dropped.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the point. The Senator is correct in that.

Mr. LODGE. That is the precise point. Every seven years there would be an opportunity for such selection as to who should be kept and who should be put out. We should be harassed all the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is to be done according to the efficiency record in the department.

Mr. LODGE. That would not amount to very much under the pressure.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, with some of us. The efficiency record the clerks have made is no guide under this law to their right to reappointment—none whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The seven years applies to the service of each clerk. It does not mean that at the end of each seven years they go, all of them. It applies to the service of any one clerk.

Mr. CUMMINS. At the end of seven years, according to this bill. Suppose that all the employees of the Interior Department had gone in at the same time, and the seven years, we will assume, have expired, there is in this bill no requirement that the Secretary of the Interior shall employ or reemploy a single one of them. There is in the bill a provision that prohibits him from employing any of them if they have not maintained the standard of efficiency which will be prescribed. That is a prohibition, but there is no command that if they have maintained this efficiency they shall be employed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why is not that as far as any legislation for the good of the service should go?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE in the chair). The Senator will suspend for a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. H. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The question I was seeking to ask the Senator from Iowa is that if the inefficient must be absolutely dropped, what occasion is there possibly to go any further with the measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know what the reason is for leaving the proficients in doubt as to the retention of their services? If we drop the inefficient why should we in any way desire to interfere with the proficient?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the purpose is to enable the heads of departments to discharge whomsoever they please, and rid the department of their old employees every seven years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But it goes further, and allows them to drop the proficient, if they shall see fit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I say they are not permitted to reemploy the inefficient and they are not required to remove the efficient. That is the substance of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The terms of the provision, then, would mean the getting rid of the inefficient.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have stated my view of it as clearly as I can. I think it destroys substantially the adopted idea of the civil service, and will be exceedingly disastrous to the public welfare.

I now desire to say a word with regard to another point in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the Senator proceeds to another subject, I should like to ask him whether the Committee on Civil Service, of which he is chairman, has not been considering matters relating to the organization of the Civil Service, or is about to enter upon such consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I answer that by saying that certain members of the committee, and particularly the chairman, have been considering it most carefully, and that committee, I think, will shortly present to the Senate a comprehensive act or bill relating to the entrance to the civil service, promotions in it, and demotions in it. We already have presented a bill regarding retirement from it, but of course there is no——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether he thinks it the proper method of proceeding to the investigation of this question and action upon it to allow a provision of this kind to be put in by the Appropriations Committee of the House, and then have the Senate forced to its consideration and action upon it during the closing days of the session, with the danger of the failure of the bill unless the Senate complies with the requirements of the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. I regard it as exceedingly unwise and very destructive. This is as fine an illustration of the evil of legislating on general subjects upon appropriation bills as can possibly be exhibited. I know that we have all been guilty of that practice, but I earnestly hope that at least after the present session it will become a habit of Congress not to legislate upon appropriation bills.

It has just been suggested that possibly I did not make it clear that this provision reported by the committee of conference applies not only to employees hereafter coming into the service but applies to all the employees now in the service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So that at once a great many of the terms of service will have expired?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the bill provides that it shall be seven years. In 1919 is the first expiration under the bill. It allows those who are now in to remain seven years more.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, it will be seven years from the 1st day of September, 1912, before the commencement of the reconsideration of those concerned, and then they have a year in which they may renew their terms. They do not all go at once. They have one year.

Now, as to the new ones, the date does not commence until after their regular appointment succeeding the probation period, which is 6 months in some cases and 12 in others. So it is 7½ to 8 years in the case of the new appointees, and it is between 7 and 8 years in the case of the old ones.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does give for the entire service one year to change 22,000 or 23,000 employees, a most considerable undertaking if it were carried out.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator think that it would really change any considerable percentage?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I hope it would not result in a universal change, but that is the possibility. That is the right that is given to the heads of departments.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator upon reflection will agree with me that it is highly improbable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, as I understand the Senator, it does nothing toward getting rid of the inefficient for seven years.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes. There are two sections. There is the section as to the efficiency. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, the efficiency report from each department will be sent to the Civil Service, which shall establish an efficiency bureau. On the examinations those whose percentages are reported—to use numbers so as to put it in the RECORD—say, at 50, will be immediately dismissed because of inefficiency. If they arrive at, we will say, 60, they are candidates for demotion because of partial inefficiency. If they arrive at 75, we will say, they remain stationary, and if they arrive at, say, 85, they are subjects for promotion. That is to go on constantly under the other section—the one that passed the Senate in the first place.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wyoming has stated it fairly, but, of course, the rating that will be established for dismissal will probably be so low that a good deal of inefficiency would be retained, as it is now retained.

I refer now to the part of the bill which relates to the abolition of the Commerce Court and the transfer of the business which is there pending and the bringing of new suits. I stated yesterday that I feared if the report of the committee were adopted there would be great confusion, if not very great danger, for the future. I want it to be known that I did not concur in the provision that is made. I understand and I know it is true, because I have collaborated with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with respect to it—I understand that there will be a concurrent resolution introduced for the purpose of taking out a part of the report and substituting what I believe to be an effective provision. If the concurrent resolution passes and the bill is modified in that way, I think it will be effective; but if the concurrent resolution does not pass and the bill remains as it is reported by the conferees, I gravely doubt whether we will have a workable law.

I have not known just what to do with regard to the matter—whether to take it for granted that the concurrent resolution would pass and that the bill would be corrected or whether to endeavor to secure a correction through the medium of the conference committee. But on the whole I have concluded that I will pursue the course which has been suggested, to allow the bill to be corrected by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have the provisions of the conference report with reference to the Commerce Court been read to the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. They were read yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was out of the Senate yesterday and did not hear them. Have the conferees stricken out the amendments offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment which was proposed originally by the Senator from Georgia, and which I attempted by a further amendment to elaborate a little, removing these circuit judges, has been abandoned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. These circuit judges now are to be assigned to different parts of the country where deaths take place?

Mr. CUMMINS. They are.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, although one of them lives in a northeastern circuit, if a circuit judge dies in the fifth circuit, where I live, instead of having a circuit judge appointed from the bar of that circuit he is to be detailed down there to come and take the place on our circuit? Is that the plan?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia may have to suffer that experience under this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My hope, then, would be that our circuit judge did not die.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe I have pointed out the objections that I have to this report. I regard the matter of the civil service as so vital that I very much hope the report will not be adopted and that the bill may be recommitted to the conferees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word or two in perfect agreement with the views of the Senator from Iowa. It is eminently proper that there should be some legislation with reference to our civil service, but it ought to be carefully prepared; it ought to be comprehensive; it ought to be laid upon the desks of Senators and left here to be studied all by itself. It ought not to be done in piecemeal; it ought not to be tied onto an appropriation bill, and it ought not to be forced through the Senate as little understood as this measure is now.

I confess that still I do not comprehend in detail these provisions. I have not read them and studied them. I know that those originally coming from the House were objectionable and the Senate rejected them. It seems to me that this being brand-new legislation upon a question of great importance it ought to go out of this appropriation bill altogether, and the subject should be taken up when coming from the proper committees and we should legislate upon it. I am satisfied that the object to be accomplished in this proposed legislation can be accomplished effectually in a better way if it is handled as a separate measure.

Again, Mr. President, I do not think that these circuit judges ought to be allowed to wander all over the country. If they are to remain circuit judges and are to take places, they ought to be confined to their own territory. It will be a very unsatisfactory situation if the court is abolished and these judges are to take places outside of their own circuits and do work for which they were really not intended. I shall certainly vote against the report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, to me it seems perfectly plain that if the Commerce Court ought to be abolished the judges who were appointed to serve in that court ought to go with the court itself, and I can not agree that they shall be left a charge upon the Public Treasury when their services are not needed. I think no Senator here would have advocated the creation of five additional circuit judges except for the creation of this court. If in the wisdom of Congress it is deemed best to abolish this court, there is certainly no sufficient work for these judges to do, and no man ought to draw a salary from the Public Treasury unless he renders a public service equivalent to his compensation. Therefore, if I were willing to abolish the court, I could not consent to an arrangement under which the court should disappear and the judges remain.

But, Mr. President, I must say to the Senate, as I said when this matter was before the body originally, that I can not consent to the abolition of this court, because, in the first place, I regard it simply as a legislative recall and subject to all the objections that can be made against that assault upon our judiciary system. In the next place, I believe it is a mistake to abolish the court, because I am confident that if it is left it will more than justify the wisdom of those who originally established it. I can not comprehend why it shall be determined to discontinue this court before it has existed long enough to demonstrate the wisdom or the mistake of its creation. Particularly as you are going to leave the judges, why not leave the court until by an orderly procedure it shall be demonstrated to the country that it is unwise?

I would not hesitate to vote to abolish a court that had fully answered the purposes for which it was created. If we were to establish a court of patents, and then we were to repeal our patent laws and leave every inventor to his own devices to protect himself, I would not hesitate to abolish the patent court. If I had lived at the time the private land claims court existed, and when it had completed its work, whether it had done it well or ill, I would not have hesitated to abolish it.

But here is a court created to serve a most important purpose, which still must be served by some tribunal; and yet it now is proposed to abolish it before it has been in existence long enough to justify any man in saying whether the creation of it was wise or otherwise.

I am perfectly confident, Mr. President, that if this court is permitted to remain until it could have a fair test it will so thoroughly vindicate its existence before the people of this country that there will be no effort to abolish it.

I do not pretend to say that the courts existing before this court was created can not try these cases and can not try them conformably to the law and the testimony, but I do say that if those courts try these cases there are many cases pending in them which they can not promptly try; and if the Government is to be heard, and the Government ought to be heard, in preference to all of the other litigants, because a great public interest is at stake in these cases, then it is inevitable that many private suitors to whom the settlement of their case is of vast and sometimes of vital importance must be denied a prompt disposition of their cause.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it is inevitable that a judge engaged about the ordinary trial of causes in the average district court of the United States must require a longer time to hear and decide these cases than would be true of a judge who has devoted himself for a term of years to their exclusive consideration.

I was originally of the opinion that there ought to have been no change in this court. I was originally of the opinion that a commerce court ought to have been created and that the President ought to have appointed to that court men whose character, intellect, and standing at the bar qualified them for a place on the Supreme Bench of the United States.

But after a careful consideration of the question I am not by any means certain that I was right, and I am rather disposed to accept the reasoning of those Senators who believed that it was desirable to avoid making the judges of this court purely specialists by sending them back at stated intervals to their circuits to resume the ordinary work of a United States judge, and thus liberalize their minds by a consideration of general subjects.

Mr. President, to my mind it is clear that average district judges who will be appointed by any President of the United States will not be as well qualified to try these cases as the judges who will be designated by the Chief Justice of the United States under the law as it now stands. The Chief Justice is in a peculiarly fortunate position to make these selections. Coming to that great tribunal from all parts of the country are appeals from these various courts, and the Chief Justice and his brothers—and I have no doubt that he would consult his brothers before he exercised the power vested in him by this act—know who are the greatest intellects and the highest characters of the inferior Federal bench. They know the men who have most deeply studied these peculiar questions, and it would be such men that the present Chief Justice and any other man who follows him in that great office would be certain to call to this special court.

Do you think it wise to abolish a court which is selected under this arrangement by the Chief Justice and remit these litigants to a court appointed by Presidents, many of whom were not lawyers and some of whom, I regret to say, though lawyers, have not been good lawyers?

Two of the three principal candidates for the Presidency to-day are not lawyers. Can you expect them to make such wise selections for this particular work as men who are lawyers? Conceding that they are as well qualified to select the judge as a President who is a lawyer, it still remains true that no man in this world so fully appreciates the necessity of a great lawyer for the bench as a lawyer himself, and the appreciation of the lawyer for a great judge will always be in exact proportion to the President's ability and learning as a lawyer.

By the abolition of this court we put ourselves on record as saying we would rather commit these great causes to the trial of judges appointed by a President who may not be a lawyer than to commit them to trial in a court whose members were selected by the greatest of all lawyers, for we must always assume that the Chief Justice of the United States is the head of his profession in this country.

Mr. President, I have no hesitation in saying that this court will so far expedite the trial of these cases that one-half the time will suffice for their final disposition if this court remains that will be required if this court is abolished.

It may not be any argument for the existence of this court, but I can not close my mind to the fact that this is the second time in the history of this Republic that a United States court has ever been abolished, and the courts themselves were not really abolished in the other instance. There the court remained and the judges were legislated out of office, but here we are asked to destroy the court and leave the judges still in office. Toward the close of John Adams's administration, and after the Federalist Party had been defeated and driven from power in the presidential and vice presidential offices, after it had lost control of both Houses of Congress, it sought refuge in the judiciary.

John Adams appointed John Marshall, then his Secretary of State, to be Chief Justice; and notwithstanding he appeared in the Supreme Court and took the oath of office as Chief Justice on the 4th of February, he continued to serve President Adams as Secretary of State until the expiration of his term at midnight on the 3d of the following March. As a further part of that plan to control and nationalize the Government through the judiciary, the Federalist Congress created 17 additional circuit judgeships, and John Adams appointed 17 Federalist lawyers to fill them. It is sometimes said—though I doubt if that is true, for I have never been able to verify it—that Jefferson's Attorney General appeared at the door at midnight—it was then supposed that a term expired at midnight on the 3d of March and not, as is now the case, at noon on the 4th of March—with Jefferson's watch in his hand and called time on John Adams and John Marshall as they were filling out these commissions. But whether it is exactly true or not, we do know that they were engaged in that not creditable work until the expiration of Adams's term, or so nearly to it that they were not able to deliver all the commissions which they had filled out; and the case of Marbury against Madison arose out of the circumstance that a commission for a justice of the peace in that part of the District of Columbia which then included Alexandria had not been delivered, and Thomas Jefferson ordered James Madison, his Secretary of State, not to deliver it. Almost immediately upon the convening of the new Congress Jefferson is supposed to have set John Randolph on those midnight judges, as they were called then, and have since been known in our political history; and Congress repealed the act which created the new judgeships. Had I lived at that time I would have voted to have repealed that act, because a purely political advantage was sought in the creation of those judges, and political considerations justified its repeal. But there is no suggestion that this court was created to serve a political purpose. This court was created under the deliberate opinion of the American Congress that it would be a useful instrumentality in exercising a great power of the General Government; and before we make the courts of this country the football of shifting political control in the two Houses of Congress it is best that we should pause. Let us, at least, pay the decent respect to the wisdom of our predecessors of giving the court they created time enough to justify their wisdom, if it can, and if it can not, then we may hope—we may more than hope—we may expect practical unanimity in its repeal.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the proposed legislation contained in this conference report would lead us to some complications and rather strange results, as it seems to me.

The statute under which the Commerce Court was created, as I understand, is left absolutely intact; there is no repeal of the statute authorized; there is simply the abolition of the court that was created by that act; and the purpose is to transfer the jurisdiction that was vested in that court to the district courts throughout the country. That being the case, the transfer of the circuit judges by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is absolutely taken away. The statute provides:

The Commerce Court shall be a court of record, and shall have a seal of such form and style as the court may prescribe. The said court shall be composed of five judges, to be from time to time designated and assigned thereto by the Chief Justice of the United States, from among the circuit judges of the United States—except that in the first instance the court shall be composed of the five additional circuit judges to be appointed as hereinafter provided, who shall be designated by the President to serve for one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, in order that the period of designation of one of the said judges shall expire in each year thereafter.

Bear that in mind. There can be no transfers to this court—

Now, although that particular provision in the statute is not repealed in express terms, the effect of it is entirely destroyed. Then we have this further provision:

If, at any time, the business of the Commerce Court does not require the services of all the judges, the Chief Justice of the United States may, by writing, signed by him and filed in the Department of Justice, terminate the assignment of any of the judges or temporarily assign him for service in any circuit court or circuit court of appeals.

Now, bear that in mind—he can transfer him only to circuit courts and circuit courts of appeal.

Under that provision of the statute, which is left in force, the five additional judges that are provided for can not be so assigned as to assist in doing the work that is imposed upon the district courts, because under this provision, unless there is some authority for it under the general law relating to that subject, there can be no transfer of these judges to the district courts to assist in that labor. I read further:

In case of illness or other disability of any judge assigned to the Commerce Court the Chief Justice of the United States may assign any other circuit judge of the United States to act in his place, and may terminate such assignment when the exigence therefor shall cease; and any circuit judge so assigned to act in place of such judge shall, during his assignment, exercise all the powers and perform all the functions of such judge.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that this act deals exclusively with judges of the circuit court; it has no application to district courts or district judges; it does not authorize the transfer of any judge who is designated to sit in the Commerce Court to serve in any of the district courts; and we are left just in this position, that all of this business is transferred from the Commerce Court to the district courts, and no provision is made to assist in doing that work that will be cast upon the judges of the district courts.

I do not know how it may be in other districts throughout the country, but I know in the district of Southern California the district judge of that court is utterly unable—physically unable—to try the cases that are now presented to him for consideration. He is one of the ablest judges, I think, this country has to-day, a man who is diligent and industrious, but it is an utter impossibility for him to take care of the business that he has now to look after. If this additional business is thrown into that court it will simply tend to deny justice to private litigants.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if these five additional judges are to be continued in office there should be some provision made by which they could be transferred or assigned to the district courts to assist in doing the work that the district judges in some cases are unable to perform within a reasonable time.

I simply call this to the attention of the Senate and of the committee in order that, if it can be done at this late day, some provision may be made by which the business that is transferred to the district courts may be disposed of more readily and promptly by the assignment of these judges to that work.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I voted against the abolishment of the Commerce Court, and I should be quite glad if an opportunity presented itself to vote against it again. I quite agree with what the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] said with reference to that court. We created it with the belief that it would be a useful court, and we are undertaking to abolish it before it has been thoroughly tried out. If in the early history of this Government that method had been followed with reference to the Supreme Court of the United States, if it had been possible to abolish that court under the Constitution—which it was not—that court would have been gotten rid of, because the Supreme Court of the United States for the first two or three years of its history had less business to do than the Commerce Court has had. I feel quite certain that if the court might be continued it would only be a few years until it would more than justify its creation.

I am glad, however, that, notwithstanding the fact that it was found impossible to retain the Commerce Court, the managers of the conference upon the part of the Senate have agreed to recede from the amendment which we adopted here abolishing the judgeships, because, while I have no doubt of the power of Congress to abolish the Commerce Court or to abolish any court which Congress creates, I have, on the other hand, no doubt whatever that Congress has not power to abolish a judgeship when once created. The reasons——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence. The reasons for making that statement I gave very fully upon a prior occasion, and I do not intend to enter upon them again.

Mr. BORAH. Did not Congress abolish certain judgeships in 1799 or 1800?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; Congress undertook to abolish, as the Senator from Texas said, 17 judgeships, but my recollection is that 16 judgeships were abolished; but the vote upon that question was purely a partisan vote. It was antagonized by the greatest lawyers in both branches of Congress, and it has been condemned by law writers, and, personally, I have no doubt that the action of Congress at that early day was utterly without constitutional warrant, as I believe the vote of the Senate upon this same question was without constitutional warrant.

But, Mr. President, I rose to speak briefly about another proposition. In the amendment reported by the conferees with reference to the jurisdiction heretofore possessed by the Commerce Court it is provided:

All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose, and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought by or against the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce, set aside, or modify the decrees and orders of the commission shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

If the Commerce Court is to be abolished, as, apparently, it is, we are all concerned in having the jurisdiction possessed by that court properly transferred to some other court, and I think very clearly the language of the provision I have just read does not do it. I want to analyze it for just a moment:

All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

As I view it, there are two defects in that provision as I have thus far read it. First, the action is to be transferred to and deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action arose. If it is intended by that to mean the original cause of action, it may have arisen in a half dozen different districts, a case involving railway rates upon the Union Pacific Railroad, for example, and its connecting line between Omaha and San Francisco. Such a cause of action would arise in every judicial district through which the road ran, so that it is not sufficient to say "pending in the district court of the judicial district."

In addition to that the reference is to the "district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose." The cause of action which is involved in a proceeding before the Commerce Court is based upon an order made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that cause of action necessarily arises where the order is made. The order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is made in Washington; so that, applied in that way, the provision would be utterly meaningless. The same criticism that I have made with reference to that would apply to the further provisions with respect to the venue of suits hereafter to be brought. All such suits shall hereafter be brought—in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

If I did not believe that that could be corrected by a proceeding to be immediately taken I should feel constrained to vote against this conference report, because I feel—and in that respect I concur entirely with the Senator from Iowa, who first raised the question yesterday—that if this provision should remain in the law as it now reads it would be utterly ineffective; that there would be no court that would possess jurisdiction in this class of cases; but I think the matter may be corrected by a concurrent resolution authorizing a change in the enrollment of the bill as has been done heretofore in similar cases. If this report of the conference committee shall be accepted by the Senate and by the House I intend to offer a concurrent resolution to that end which will provide, in place of the language now in the amendment proposed by the conferees, the following:

All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission arose—

I think that will correct both the defects to which I have called attention—such district to be designated by the complainant—

It is necessary to make provision that the district shall be designated by the complainant, otherwise there would be no way of determining which one of these particular districts should receive the papers—and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought to enforce, set aside, annul, or modify any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission arose.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he concurs in the view I have expressed, that under this provision there can be no assignment of the additional circuit judges to district courts? If so, I desire to inquire whether it would not be wise to include in the concurrent resolution to which he has referred, if that can be done, so as to avoid the defeat of this report, a provision that assignment may be made as provided in this act or otherwise of the additional judges to service on the district bench?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I listened to what the Senator from California had to say upon that subject, and I think there is great force in his suggestion.

Mr. WORKS. It seems to me that the language of the act absolutely excludes any idea of their assignment to the district court.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seemed to me—I followed the Senator as closely as I could in his presentation of the matter—that the Senator was right about it, and perhaps that matter should be taken care of as well. However, I have been examining the Judicial Code with a view to seeing whether or not there is a provision in that code which permitted the assignment of circuit judges. I know there is a general provision upon that subject.

Mr. WORKS. I thought perhaps there might be some general provision, and I suggested that in the few remarks I made on the subject. Of course if that be so it would be unnecessary to take cognizance of it here in any way. I am not as familiar with that code as is the Senator from Utah, because I was not here when it was enacted, and I have had no occasion to examine it with any degree of care. Of course, if there is a provision already in the general statute on the subject, it need not be dealt with here.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Utah in his suggestion as to this matter, but I rise only to suggest that, in view of the further uncertainty pointed out by the Senator from California and in view of the positive legislative wrong that is being done with regard to the civil service, the best way to deal with these things is to defeat the conference report and send it back to the conferees, so that they can cure not only the points covered by the proposed concurrent resolution, but the point covered by the suggestion of the Senator from California and the civil-service proposition at the same time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator has probably observed the differences that arise here from time to time among the lawyers in the Senate, and what assurance have we, if the bill is sent back to conference——

Mr. CUMMINS. None at all.

Mr. WARREN. And is thrown open on all sides, that we may not again meet differences, for the whole conference report falls if we do not adopt it, and every item is remanded to disagreement?

Mr. CUMMINS. But the conferees on the part of the Senate will have ascertained in this debate some of the objections and difficulties, and I am sure will be quick and effective to remedy them. I know that the conferees on the part of the Senate have a hard time of it, but the first consideration is to get legislation that will do what we want done. I know that it is bothersome and troublesome, but I am sure that in the end we will get what we desire, if we persevere.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish I could arrive at a time when there would be a conclusion among those interested so that we would know what all desire. One source of trouble in sending back a bill of this kind to conference is that every item in the bill is opened again for reconsideration, and our experience is that when the Senate sends a bill back the conferees on the part of the Senate are met with counter propositions from the other side, because those who favor items not in the conference report wish them inserted and to take advantage of the situation; so we have a very hard proposition to face. Is it not better to do as the Senator from Utah has proposed—follow the bill with a concurrent resolution—and undertake to correct it in that way?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am very much opposed to the adoption of the report on other grounds than the one pointed out by the Senator from Utah. I think it is to the last degree unwise to adopt the provision that has been brought forward with respect to the civil service, and I think if we would arm our conferees with a direct vote of the Senate upon that point there would be no difficulty in securing a proper adjustment. It seems to me that with regard to everything except raising salaries, that is the chief point in this bill that the Senate has surrendered to the House, and I do not see why it can not insist upon some of the chief things—first, the civil service; and, second, the abolition of the Commerce Court judgeships.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, there were, as the record shows, 515 amendments adopted by the Senate to this bill. The conferees have been dealing with the subject for many days; their labors, I know, have been most arduous, and I for one would only vote to send it back to conference for the strongest reasons, and I do not, for the reasons I have stated, feel constrained to vote to reject the conference report. I think the matters to which I have adverted can be corrected in the way I have suggested, and I do not believe that the other matters are of sufficient gravity to warrant us in sending the bill back to conference.

With reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from California, I call the attention of the Senator from California to the language of section 18 of the Judicial Code, which provides that—

Whenever, in the judgment of the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the district lies, or of the circuit justice assigned to such circuit, or of the Chief Justice, the public interest shall require, the said judge, or associate justice, or Chief Justice, shall designate and appoint any circuit judge of the circuit to hold said district court.

He has full power in that respect.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, to which the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourned, the Senate is now in session for the trial of the articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives were announced and were conducted by the Assistant Doorkeeper to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk.

The respondent, Judge Robert W. Archbald, accompanied by his counsel, Mr. A. S. Worthington and Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., entered the Chamber and took the seats provided for them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask if it is in order to make a point of no quorum. If it is, I desire to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Cummins	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Bailey	Dillingham	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Fall	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Fletcher	Newlands	Smoot
Bourne	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Stone
Bradley	Gronna	Overman	Sutherland
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Page	Swanson
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Pomerene	Tillman
Burnham	La Follette	Reed	Townsend
Burton	Lodge	Root	Warren
Catron	McCumber	Sanders	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Shively	Wetmore
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 60 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. May I inquire how many Members of the Senate have not yet been sworn in the court?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is desired, the Secretary will report the names of the Senators who have not yet been sworn.

The Secretary read as follows:

Messrs. BROWN, CHILTON, CURTIS, DAVIS, DIXON, DU PONT, GORE, LEA, OWEN, RAYNER, and RICHARDSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Journal of the last sitting of the court will be read.

The Secretary read the Journal, and it was approved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order which has just been read, in reciting the proceedings of the former meeting, is the order which was pending at the time of the adjournment of the Senate at its last session sitting as a Court of Impeachment. The Chair will inquire of the managers on the part of the House whether they desire now to bring that to the attention of the Senate?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Excuse me for a moment.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, before the question of fixing a date for the trial is taken up, I wish to state that after more careful consideration of the pleadings in the case and what was said in reference to what has been put upon those pleadings, and especially the replication, the counsel and the respondent himself have concluded that it is not necessary to file any further pleadings; and I accordingly notified the managers of that by a letter to Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I should like to have that letter incorporated in the record at this point as explaining why, after what took place here on Thursday, we are now willing to go on without any further pleadings.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, the managers have no objection to the suggestion made by counsel for the respondent.

I beg to say to the court that I brought along with me the letter referred to by the counsel for the respondent. I received the letter this morning, and I think it proper that it be incorporated into the proceedings at this point. I therefore ask that the clerk, in accordance with the suggestion of the counsel, read the letter at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

LAW OFFICES OF A. S. WORTHINGTON,
COLUMBIAN BUILDING, 416 FIFTH STREET NW.,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1912.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Board of Managers in the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as counsel for Judge Archbald have decided not to file any further pleadings in his case, it is due to the board of managers that I should notify them of that fact and inform them why counsel have changed their minds on this subject since the argument in the Senate yesterday.

In the respondent's first answer to each of the articles of impeachment he avers in substance that the article does not set forth an impeachable offense. In the first paragraph of the replication filed on behalf of the House of Representatives issue was joined on these answers. But as to the whole of the sixth article and as to part of the thirteenth article the respondent pleads in substance that even if the article sets forth an impeachable offense it sets it forth in such general and indefinite terms that the respondent should not be called upon to answer it. And as to the thirteenth article, the plea is made that it is bad because it undertakes to charge in one article two separate and distinct offenses.

We do not find in the replication any distinct reference to either of these two last-mentioned defenses, relating one to both the sixth and the thirteenth articles and the other to the thirteenth article alone. It was our impression yesterday that for this reason some further pleading would be necessary on our part as to these two matters. However, as you stated in the Senate yesterday that it is the understanding of the board of managers that their replication is a denial of all our allegations as to the insufficiency of the articles of impeachment, whether on one ground or another, counsel for the respondent have decided that they will accept this construction of the replication made by the board of managers. This being so, no further pleading seems to be necessary, and we will be ready, when the Senate meets to-morrow, to take up the question of the date of trial.

Yours, very truly,
A. S. WORTHINGTON,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to be hypercritical of the language employed by the counsel, but so far as my investigation goes, I am led to understand that the managers of the House have never before been spoken of as a board of managers. I therefore ask the counsel to strike from his letter the words "board of" wherever they occur. We are not a board of managers. We are the managers on the part of the House of Representatives; and while not a purist, not a hair-splitting dealer in technicalities, I think it is proper that in papers of this character and of this solemnity the usual forms be followed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I accede to the request of the managers. I am happy to call them by the name they select.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will make the correction.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. With the permission of the court, I ask that the order which was pending before the court when adjournment was last had be now reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, I have conferred with the counsel for the respondent, and desire to move that the first paragraph of the order—or, if the order were divided, it would be the first order—be amended by adding after the words "nineteen hundred and twelve" the words which I ask the Secretary to report.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the first order the following:

And further ordered, That in case hereafter the managers or the respondent may desire the attendance of additional witnesses, in such case the managers or the respondent may have the witness or witnesses desired subpœnaed in accordance with the practice and usage of the Senate upon application in such form as may be approved by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the managers on the part of the House desire that the order presented by them shall be modified to that extent.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Yes; and that meets the approval of counsel for the respondent.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. It is true we have agreed upon that language so far as the first part of the order is concerned.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I will say, if I may be permitted for just one minute, that I find, upon investigating cases like this that have been before the Senate, that sometimes the proposition which is embodied in this amendment has not been incorporated in the order; but, so far as I can ascertain, the uniform practice of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment has been always to give in a proper case to either party to the controversy the right to have additional witnesses subpœnaed; and the amendment is in proper form.

It may be said that in one case, at least, where the question of the adoption of a proper order for additional witnesses was raised, the application was referred to a committee of three, as provided in the order. We think that duty can be well discharged by the Presiding Officer, and so we have drawn the amendment in the form in which it is presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the desire of the Senate that the order as modified shall be read at this time? [A pause.] If not, the Chair will inquire whether the managers on the part of the House have anything to submit in support of that order.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, nothing more upon the amendment; and in support of the main proposition, the subpœnaing of witnesses and fixing a day for the trial of the case, I have but little to add to what I had the honor and privilege of saying to the Senate the other day.

As will be observed, the order as presented embodies two propositions, one the necessary forerunner of the other, the first proposition being to provide for process upon the witnesses and having the witnesses present, and then the second order or the second proposition involved in the order, if we treat it as one order, provides for a day for the trial.

I may say that, so far as I know, whenever an order of this kind has been presented, involving the two propositions, but necessarily related, there perhaps has been a division of the question. But in its finality it is really but one question, because there would be no use to have the witnesses subpœnaed without having a day fixed for the trial, and if a day for the trial is fixed, then an appropriate order of course as a corollary ought to be made providing for the subpœnaing of witnesses.

Mr. President, I want to say a word in regard to the action of the court on the 1st day of this month, in which the managers were persuaded to acquiesce in the postponement of the consideration of the question of fixing a day for the trial, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], that the respondent should have until to-day to prepare a formal application for a continuance. Perhaps I should not use the word "continuance," for the counsel for the respondent this morning informed me that he was not pleading for a continuance, but for a postponement, and therefore to accommodate him and for the sake of euphony I use the word "postponement"; but it is a continuance as a matter of substance for which he is pleading.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. President, except that upon further conference with my associate managers we are more than ever convinced that this trial ought to be proceeded with now. But I was about to say a bit ago, and I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that yielding to the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Virginia, and agreeing that this matter should be determined to-day, instead of on the 1st day of the month, when the application for the order was made, subtracts from the time allowance fixed in that order, for the preparation of the subpœnaing of the witnesses and the trial of the case, three days. That order contemplated seven days for the subpœnaing of witnesses and for the preparation of the trial. To-morrow is Sunday, and therefore we could not have the process to-morrow, and we would have only Monday and Tuesday intervening between now and the 7th, the day which was originally fixed in the order for the trial.

I doubt very much, Mr. President, to be frank and candid with the court, and I hope I shall be so all through the trial of this case, the ability of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to serve the process on these witnesses in time to have them here on Wednesday. But we shall leave that matter entirely to the judgment of the Senate. If the Senate is of the opinion that we can have the witnesses here Wednesday the managers on the part of the House will be ready to proceed. We are entirely ready to proceed on every other phase of the case, and therefore I do not ask that the time be put over beyond Wednesday, but I make the suggestion in order that the Senate itself may take it into consideration.

Mr. President, the managers have nothing else to suggest now except to insist that this case be set down for trial on Wednesday next, and, of course, if counsel opposes that, as we understand he is here to oppose that proposition, then we shall ask to be heard in reply to him.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I do not recall that the Senate or any Member of it, when we were here on Thursday, held or said that what was to be done to-day was the presentation of a motion for a formal continuance, by which I understand, as that term is used in courts of justice, an application to have the case go over to the next term. The Senate of the United States is a continuing body, and I am not asking for any postponement beyond the time when the present session of Congress will last. We are here therefore before a court, the case at issue, and the question is simply, When shall the case be tried or when shall it come on for trial?

Admonished, however, by the suggestions made by my friends, the managers, or some of them, I have, so far as concerns the grounds upon which I make the application for the fixing of a later day, put the papers in the form of an affidavit by the respondent, and accompanying affidavits which are referred to in it, and I will ask that the affidavit of the respondent be read at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the Senate of the United States sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

UNITED STATES v. ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

The respondent, Robert W. Archbald, on oath says as follows:

Shortly before the articles of impeachment in this case were presented to the House of Representatives by its Committee on the Judiciary, I attempted to confer in Scranton with those of my counsel who reside in that city (where the labor of preparing for the trial of the case must mainly be performed) with reference to certain matters relating to my defense. I found that one of them, Mr. M. J. Martin, was in a hospital in Scranton, where he had just undergone a severe surgical operation, and that the other, Mr. Samuel B. Price, had broken down in health and in consequence thereof had left Scranton, and that it was expected that he would be absent for at least several weeks. I have recently obtained affidavits from their physicians as to their present condition, which I submit herewith.

The summons of the Senate requiring me to appear on July 19, in answer to the articles of impeachment against me, was served upon me in Scranton at half past 11 o'clock on the night of July 17. I came to Washington at once, my son, Robert W. Archibald, jr., of my counsel, accompanying me from Philadelphia. Ever since that time I have been almost constantly engaged in conference with my counsel in reference to the pleadings in the case, especially with reference to the answer to the articles of impeachment, and I have not been able, nor have my counsel, to give any time to that part of the preparation of the case relating to the actual trial.

Ever since I arrived in Washington on July 18 I have been endeavoring to engage the services of additional counsel, being advised by my present counsel that that is necessary. In every such case I have found that the person with whom I sought to communicate was on his vacation, either in Europe or in this country, and for that reason I was either unable to engage his services or unable to get into communication with him at all.

For the foregoing reasons, and for other reasons which are apparent on the record in this case and which will be stated by my counsel, it will be impossible for me to properly prepare for my trial upon the several articles of impeachment before the middle of October next. I have no wish to delay the trial a single day beyond what I myself and my counsel think is absolutely essential to fully prepare and present to the Senate the important questions of law involved in the case, and to investigate and obtain the evidence relating to the numerous questions of fact which will arise or may arise during the trial.

R. W. ARCHBALD.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, a notary public in and for the District of Columbia, this 3d day of August, 1912.

[SEAL.] JOSIE A. GORMAN,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Now, Mr. President, I should like to have read the affidavits of physicians as to the present or very recent condition of the two counsel referred to in the affidavit of the respondent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The affidavits will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the honorable the United States Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment:

This is to certify that M. J. Martin, Esq., attorney at law, of the city of Scranton, Pa., was operated upon for appendicitis by me, a practicing physician and surgeon of said city, on Saturday, July 6, instant; and that since that time he has been and still is in my hospital under my charge, and that his condition is such that he can not with safety undertake professional work for upward of eight weeks from date.

REED BURNS.

CITY OF SCRANTON,
State of Pennsylvania, ss:

Dr. Reed Burns, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is a practicing physician and surgeon of Scranton, Pa., of upward of 30 years' experience, and that the statements made in the above certificate are correct and true.

REED BURNS.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 22d day of July, A. D. 1912.

[SEAL.] RALPH W. HYMER, Notary Public.

My commission expires January 21, 1915.

To the honorable the United States Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment:

This is to certify that S. B. Price, Esq., attorney at law, of the city of Scranton, Pa., is now and has been since June 20, 1912, under my professional care. On that date he had a breakdown, and by my advice and direction has undertaken no professional work since that time, and in my judgment can not with safety undertake any active professional work for upward of three months from date, during which time it will be necessary for him to give himself to complete rest and recuperation.

LUCIUS C. KENNEDY.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
County of Lackawanna, ss:

L. C. Kennedy, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is a practicing physician of Scranton, Pa., and has been for upward of 14 years, and that the statements made in the above certificate are correct and true.

LUCIUS C. KENNEDY.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 27th day of July, A. D. 1912.

My commission expires February 21, 1915.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment or two to some of the matters which are apparent upon the record in this case, and as to which therefore no affidavit or formal paper is necessary, as corroborating what is set forth in the affidavits which have just been read, and as indicating that it would be a denial of justice to ask this respondent to come here and to be prepared for trial in this case on the 7th day of August, or at any time approaching that date.

There are 13 articles of impeachment here, so that instead of having to prepare for the trial of one case we have to prepare for the trial of 13. Not being advised, as we can not be, as to just what evidence the honorable managers may intend to introduce in support of each one of these 13 articles, we are required to prepare ourselves to meet every possible contingency in regard to each one of them.

Some of these articles, as is apparent upon inspection, lead necessarily to the investigation of a great mass of detailed evidence. The first article of impeachment refers to a series of transactions in regard to what is known as the Katydid culm dump. In my humble judgment (and I think it will be corroborated by Senators familiar with the trial of cases who may examine that article and the reply to it), the trial on that case alone might well last a week, and to prepare for it would take more than that time.

So as to the second article, which involves a long series of transactions relating to alleged efforts on the part of the respondent with a lawyer named Watson to have certain litigation settled, to which a railroad company was a party. Take a case of that character and examine it alone, and I think you will find that it would simply be impossible for the counsel to properly prepare for a trial of even one of these cases in the time to which it is proposed to limit us.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask pardon, but if the gentleman will face this way we might get the benefit of his statement. We can scarcely hear him.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not mean that you shall turn your back on the Presiding Officer, but if you can face this way we would benefit by your remarks.

Mr. WORTHINGTON (stepping to one side of the Secretary's desk). If there is no objection, may I stand here?

Now, there is another matter. There are here several articles of impeachment which are of the most general character that it is possible to imagine. There is the sixth article, for instance, in which it is simply charged that the respondent, at some time, in places not mentioned, with somebody not indicated except that he was an officer of a certain railroad company, used his influence in a certain matter, which is not described, with the officers of a certain railroad company. In order to properly prepare for the defense on that article alone, it is necessary for the respondent to consider everything that has happened in regard to that railroad company, not only where he was directly concerned, but where it might be reasonably supposed the managers would claim he was concerned. Our past experience in this case shows that it is very possible we may be held, or attempted to be held, responsible for what was done by others, without anything tending to show knowledge on the part of the respondent.

Then, as to the thirteenth article, there is a charge in general terms that the respondent, being a circuit judge of the United States and judge of the Commerce Court, used his position as such judge to obtain credit with persons who had or might have litigation in his court. There is not a single word to indicate what transactions are intended to be relied upon by the managers in support of this general charge, when they come to the trial of this case. The managers may say that something took place before the Judiciary Committee of the House which indicated some things that might be offered in evidence under that part of that article. That is true. But if it stands as it stands at present, and we presume it may stand, we are bound to inquire of everything that went on in the city of Scranton, certainly, and elsewhere, whenever we can, and to consider and prepare for any possible charge that might be made under that general allegation.

My honorable friend, Mr. Manager CLAYTON, said the other day that if in the course of the trial it should occur that we needed time, then the Senate could give us time. But I should like to ask the Senate to consider whether, if at this stage of the session, at this time of the year, this trial should go on at the time proposed by the managers and something of that kind should develop, what consideration would the Senate give us, or with what patience would they consider an application to stop proceedings two or three days, while we could go to Scranton to see what we could find out about that new matter?

In this situation, with 13 cases to be tried, with so many questions of fact involved, there are also as important questions of law, I undertake to say, as ever came before this honorable tribunal. The Constitution of the United States provides only in general terms that Federal judges may be removed from office for treason, bribery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors without defining what crimes or misdemeanors are to be included. And it was contended in the argument which was presented here by the Judiciary Committee of the House to that body in this case that because there is another provision of the Constitution which says that Federal judges shall hold their offices only during good behavior anything which amounts to a misbehavior is an impeachable offense. We have here a series of articles which certainly include, if true, with the adverbs which are applied to them, misconduct on the part of the respondent, but also articles as to which no wrongful intent is charged and which could not by any possibility be wrongful unless there was some bad motive.

It is charged, for instance, in one of the counts that the respondent appointed a lawyer living at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., a jury commissioner under the Federal statute, and that lawyer happened to be an attorney for a certain railroad company. There is not to be found in this article one of the adverbs—unlawfully, corruptly, etc.—which are sprinkled through the other articles, nor is there in any words a charge that the jury commissioner was wrongfully or corruptly or illegally appointed. There is simply the mere fact that he appointed a lawyer who happened to be counsel for a railroad company.

Under the pleas that have been filed there must be as to each of these articles a determination of the question whether it presents an impeachable offense. This will require a presentation of the authorities, a review of the cases, and an argument on the merits of the several contentions by the ablest counsel. It surely will not be considered ultra modesty for the counsel who now represent the respondent to urge that for this reason time should be given to engage additional counsel.

In that state of the case, with all these important questions of law involved, and all these divers questions of fact arising, as to many of which we can only guess what is intended, it happened by a dispensation of Providence that the two members of the bar who reside at Scranton who are counsel for the respondent and who attended with the present counsel the hearings before the Judiciary Committee of the House have been stricken, as has been shown by the affidavits, so that we are unable to get the aid of either of them. The only counsel that are at hand now are those who are not familiar with the persons or the localities involved in almost all the cases which are presented here in the 13 articles of impeachment.

The respondent shows under his oath that since the day he arrived here, summoned here at midnight of one day to be here at noon the second day afterwards, he has made continuous efforts to get additional counsel, and you find what you might expect at this season of the year, one man on his vacation, who would not leave his vacation, and another in Europe, who can not be reached in time, and so on. So it is that of all the persons whom the respondent has sought to reach not one of them can be reached, nor can we obtain his aid at this time.

The same difficulty is likely to arise, I respectfully submit, in regard to witnesses. If we go on with the trial in the month of August or the month of September, we will be almost sure to find some of the witnesses who are required on one side or the other away on vacation.

I may say here in passing that in this city in the dog days of August and September it is almost impossible to transact business that can be avoided, and that from time immemorial no court here has tried cases at this time in the year except those of the most inferior jurisdiction. From the Supreme Court of the United States down to those judges who have the courts of first instance here there never has been a trial or a hearing or a final determination of any case in the month of August or September, as I believe, and certainly not during the 40 years or more that I have been here.

There is another thing I feel that I ought to suggest in this connection. The urgency or speed to be used in the bringing on of an impeachment trial necessarily involves a consideration of the enormity of the offense charged. If this respondent were charged with being in the habit of seizing citizens and sending them to jail without cause and without law, if in the decision of cases he had been bribed and had decided cases by favoritism and not according to what he conceived to be the right and justice of the case, it might properly be urged that he should be speedily brought to the bar for trial.

But in the 13 accusations brought here not in a single one is there a charge or intimation that in the discharge of his duties as a judge the respondent ever decided any case or ever acted upon any motion except as he might act upon it with a clear conscience and an upright mind. All that is charged against him in any of the articles is that either he placed himself in such a position or allowed himself to be placed in such a position by others that he might be influenced in the determination of his judicial duties.

Another thing that I feel bound to mention, because I have seen it mentioned in the public prints, is that, considering the proprieties of such a situation as he unfortunately finds himself placed in, Judge Archbald from the first day when the public hearings began before the Judiciary Committee of the House in this matter, in the early part of May last, has declined to take any part in the performance of his duties as a judge. He has not sat on the Commerce Court in any case, nor has he entered into consultation with any of the judges of that court respecting any matter before them. He has felt from the beginning, and feels still, that under the circumstances in which he is placed it is proper for him to decline to act as a judge at all. I say that because I have seen it intimated that he might be going on performing his duties as a judge, and for that reason he should be speedily put where he could not do so.

One word more, and then I will take my seat, Mr. President. It is that the respondent feels, and his counsel feel, that to take up this case at this time in the session, when Members have been here so long and, as we are given to understand, approaching the termination of their ordinary labors, that it will be impossible either to keep in attendance here a full body of the Senate on a matter of such importance as this or to have them listen with that patience to the presentation of the case which they might exhibit at other times in the year and when they are not situated as they are now. We fear that there will be a tendency to hasten things, which ought not to obtain in any trial, and especially in such a trial as this.

On behalf of Judge Archbald, I will simply say, in conclusion, that this is a matter which involves everything which is dear to him. It is more to him than is life itself. If the impeachment should succeed and you should find him guilty, you strip him of his judicial robe and clothe him forever in dishonor. If the case is rushed through in the way in which it is attempted to be rushed now, and an adverse result is attained, it will leave upon his mind as long as he may live a feeling that he was not justly and fairly treated. It will leave that impression upon those who are near and dear to him, and it will leave that impression upon the hundreds of people who know him in the region where he lives and the members of the bar who have practiced for many years before him, and who, he has reason to think, still believe in his integrity and his honor, and they will not be satisfied if the trial is rushed through to a conclusion in these August days.

For all these reasons I respectfully suggest, and move, if necessary, that the proposition which has been submitted by the honorable managers be amended by inserting, instead of the 7th day of August, the 15th day of October next. I mention that date as the nearest date at which we first can be properly prepared for trial. We have no particular reason for selecting that time rather than any date subsequent to it which will suit the convenience of the Senate. Any time after the 15th of October will be satisfactory to him. If he shall be given the time he asks to prepare for trial he will have no reason to complain and will make no complaint, whatever the conclusion which may be reached by this honorable tribunal.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, in the written application for this postponement in the form of the affidavit submitted by the respondent there appear to be three grounds which are submitted as reasons for the postponement. The first ground, I may say, is that one of his counsel, Mr. M. J. Martin, is sick in a hospital in Scranton, Pa., and that the other absent counsel, Mr. Price, is away on a vacation.

Mr. President, of course we all regret the illness of Mr. Martin, and we wish he were here so that the judge might have the benefit of whatever assistance he could give him, but I would be unfaithful in the discharge of my duty did I not call it to the attention of the Senate that for 30 days an investigation was had involving every one of the charges brought now to the bar of the Senate; that present during that whole time was the respondent himself and the distinguished counsel who now speaks for him, and the other counsel who is present and up to this time has not seen proper to speak.

Mr. Price and Mr. Martin had hardly anything to do with the conduct of that investigation. The printed testimony taken by that committee engaged in that solemn investigation of the conduct of this judge occupies about fourteen hundred pages of printed matter, and that volume will disclose the fact, if it is perused, that question after question, comprising pages of that record, were propounded by the distinguished counsel who had the honor of addressing the Senate a few minutes ago.

Mr. President, I may say to the Senate that when you have heard the distinguished counsel for this respondent half as long as I have heard him you will know, as I know, that he is quite able to defend his client and to see that justice is done. He needs not the help of sick Mr. Martin, nor does he need the aid of Mr. Price, away on a vacation.

And, Mr. President, I may say that the counsel for the respondent is not only well informed on this particular case, but he stands in the very forefront of the bar of the District of Columbia. It seems to me that the absence of Mr. Martin and the absence of Mr. Price do not form a sufficient reason for the postponement of the trial of this case.

The second ground is that the respondent was served on July 19 with a summons.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. July 17.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Well, here is the summons to appear July 19. I am reading from the typewritten copy you furnished me: The summons of the Senate "requiring me to appear on July 19."

That is the way it reads, Mr. President. But for the sake of agreeing with the distinguished counsel I make it the 17th; it is immaterial whether it is the 17th or the 19th.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The manager misunderstands me. It was served on him on the 17th to appear on the 19th. The manager said it was served on the 19th.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I misunderstood the counsel. Mr. President, then it proceeds to advance the proposition as an additional ground for a postponement that ever since he was served with the process of the Senate citing him to appear here he has been constantly engaged in conferences with his counsel in reference to the pleadings in the case, and, therefore, he wishes it to be inferred at least that he has not had sufficient time to consider the matter of the details, the actual trial of his case and the examination of witnesses as to what evidence he shall offer.

Now, Mr. President, in reply to that suggestion I have to say that, so far as the managers know or now believe, every witness in this case who will testify has already testified, and the testimony is in print and has been available and has been furnished to the respondent and to his counsel. He knows who the witnesses are; he has known, I believe, since about the latter part of June. I will not be accurate as to the precise date, but about the latter part of June he knew who the witnesses were and what those witnesses would testify in this trial. Therefore, Mr. President, so far as witnesses are concerned, he knows who they are now.

It may be possible that he may have other witnesses whom he may desire to call in his own behalf; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a fact now, which will appear to the Senate, I think, when the witnesses are examined before the Senate, namely, that with the exception of one witness every witness who was examined and who will be examined before this honorable body was the friend of, or at least friendly to, the respondent. There was but one witness, according to my recollection, against whom a suspicion of hostility was preferred. Some of the witnesses showed a very strong desire to so shade their testimony, to so guard their answers, as to be of as little hurt as possible to this respondent and yet at least try to make a compliance with the sanctity of the oath which they took before testifying. I can now, therefore, inform the Senate and the counsel that the witnesses whom we have examined heretofore and whose testimony is in print will be the witnesses we propose to examine on the part of the House of Representatives.

There is one witness possibly—I may say here and ought to say—whom we endeavored to get that we have been unable to find, although we had the assistance of most vigilant officers to find that witness. Why that witness has gone I know not. I certainly, Mr. President, will not charge the respondent with any agency or any instrumentality in having that witness to so depart or to so secrete himself as to put himself beyond the process of the House or the Senate. I would not be justified if I were to make such a charge, for I have no knowledge that would bear out the charge, and hence I do not make it.

But it is necessary for me to say, in order that the Senate may understand it, that there may be that witness whom we have not examined that we hope to get to examine hereafter; and possibly, Mr. President, we may have other witnesses, but I can state in perfect candor to the Senate that so far as we now know or believe the witnesses whom we have heretofore examined will be all the witnesses we propose to examine hereafter, with the one possible exception I have indicated.

Then, Mr. President, another ground for the postponement is that ever since the arrival of the respondent in Washington on July 18 he has been endeavoring to engage the services of additional counsel.

Now, Mr. President, if the accused in this case were an unlearned man, unacquainted with legal procedure, if he had an inexperienced lawyer and his chief counsel were away, perhaps it might appeal to the sound discretion of this court to grant a postponement of this trial; but the facts are, Mr. President, that the man who stands accused at the bar of this honorable court is himself learned in the law, skillful in all of the technicalities and intricacies of the law, knows how cases are tried, how witnesses are examined, how pleadings are perfected, and how every defense known to an able and skillful lawyer can be made available and interposed. He has known for months that he would probably have to face this trial; he has not been surprised at any stage of this proceeding; and to say, with the able counsel now representing him, and with his own great learning and ability, that because some lawyer—in Washington it may be—has gone to Europe or to a summer resort, that this high and honorable court should postpone a case of this gravity until next October is, I think, advancing ground that will not appeal to the sound discretion of the Senators here, who, I am sure, want to meet and discharge an unpleasant duty even in unpleasant weather.

The managers on the part of the House do not, and the House does not, desire to stay here any more than does the respondent or his counsel or perhaps some of the Members of this honorable body. But, Mr. President, the Senate and the House of Representatives are charged with a high and responsible duty. Will the argument of inconvenience persuade this honorable court to set aside the discharge of a great public duty in order—to use the language of the honorable counsel—that "the dog days" may pass by? It appears to me, if I may make the observation at this point, that for some days—we know August is generally a wet month, and therefore cooler than the rest of the summer—that Washington has been and right now is a pretty fair summer resort. Let us face the discharge of an unpleasant public duty and perform it now.

Mr. President, may I say, with the permission of the Senate and in this august presence, that the question involved is not so much whether this man shall be tried, but the remedy of impeachment itself is now on trial? I do not urge that against the respondent. He is nowise responsible for any failures there may have been heretofore in the resort to that remedy whenever it has been attempted to be invoked to remove an unfaithful or unworthy public official; but shall we accentuate the charge that is often made that the remedy of impeachment is slow, cumbersome, ineffective? I apprehend not. Postpone this case until a more convenient time, and while you may not contribute to the argument that it is an ineffective remedy you do contribute to the suggestion that it is a slow remedy.

I have about reviewed the three grounds which are stated by the counsel for the respondent for a continuance in this case. It addresses itself to the sound discretion of this court whether this case shall be tried now. I want to say that my own opinion is that whenever this case is tried the Senate will be guided solely by the law and the evidence, and I shall be fully convinced that whenever the judgment of this honorable court is pronounced it will be the judgment both of the law and the facts according to the best reasoning and the best judgment of what I believe to be one of the highest and most honorable of courts.

The honorable counsel have found some fault with the pleadings in this case. It is not my purpose at this time to discuss the pleadings. Let me remind him, however, that in the majority of the impeachment cases heretofore brought before this honorable body, crimes have not been the basis of the majority of the articles of impeachment. The Senate has never restricted the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" so narrowly as to embrace only crimes so denominated under the Constitution or so denominated by statutory enactment. The words have a broader significance. I have before me several authorities on the subject, Mr. President.

Let me quote:

IMPEACHMENT.

The offenses for which a guilty officer may be impeached are treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; art. 2, s. 4. The Constitution defines the crime of treason; art. 3, s. 3. Recourse must be had to the common law for a definition of bribery. Not having particularly mentioned what is to be understood by "other high crimes and misdemeanors," resort, it is presumed, must be had to parliamentary practice and the common law in order to ascertain what they are; Story, Const. Par. 795. It is said that impeachment may be brought to bear on any offense against the Constitution or the laws which is deserving of punishment in this manner or is of such a character as to render the officer unfit to hold his office. It is primarily directed against official misconduct, and is not restricted to political crimes alone. The decision rests really with the Senate. Black, Const. L. 121. (Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 989.)

Mr. President, I can refer you to Wharton's State Trials, where he quotes with approval the definition of an impeachable offense given by Mr. Bayard in the argument in the Blount case, and with the kind permission of the Senate, without detaining you longer with that phase of the question, I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD a few citations of authority at variance with the views which the counsel for the respondent has advanced as to what constitutes an official impeachable offense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to granting the permission requested? Without objection, it will be unanimously so ordered.

Some of the citations referred to are as follows:

IMPEACH—IMPEACHMENT.

The object of prosecutions of impeachment in England and the United States is to reach high and potent offenders, such as might be presumed to escape punishment in the ordinary tribunals, either from their own extraordinary influence or from the imperfect organization and powers of those tribunals. These prosecutions are therefore conducted by the representatives of the nation, in their public capacity, in the face of the nation, and on a responsibility which is at once felt and reverenced by the whole community. State v. Buckley (54 Ala., 599, 618, citing Story, Const., par. 688). (Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3419–3420.)

In his Commentaries on the Constitution, John Randolph Tucker defines impeachable offenses as follows (vol. 1, sec. 200):

To confine the impeachable offenses to those which are made crimes or misdemeanors by statute or other specific law would too much constrict the jurisdiction to meet the obvious purpose of the Constitution, which was, by impeachment, to deprive of office those who by any act of omission or commission showed clear and flagrant disqualification to hold it.

In Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law it is said (p. 178):

The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as, in the opinion of the House, are deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general laws. In the history of England, where the like proceeding obtains, the offenses have often been political, and in some cases for gross betrayal of public interests punishment has very justly been inflicted on cabinet officers.

In Watson on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1034), published in 1910, it is said:

There is a parliamentary definition of the term "misdemeanor," and a modern writer on the Constitution has said: "The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can only be found in the law of Parliament and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States." Synonymous with the term "misdemeanor" and the terms "misdeed," "misconduct," "misbehavior," "fault," "transgression."

In Story on the Constitution (5th ed., vol. 1, sec. 799) it is said:

Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct; and the rules of proceeding and the rules of evidence, as well as the principles of decision, have been uniformly regulated by the known doctrines of the common law and parliamentary usage. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried, no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors.

In speaking of the convention which framed the Constitution Mr. Bayard, in the trial of Blount, said that the convention—proceeded in the same manner, it is manifest, they did in many other cases; they considered the object of their legislation as a known thing, having a previous definite existence. Thus existing, their work was solely to mold it into suitable shape. They have given it to us not as a thing of their creation, but merely of their modification; and therefore I shall insist that it remain as at common law [parliamentary] with the variance only of the positive provisions of the Constitution. (Wharton's State Trials, 264; Rowle on Constitution, 200.)

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, let me return to the discussion of the application for postponement. I do not arrogate to myself the wisdom, and certainly do I not claim for myself the fairness and the impartiality, that characterize the Members of this honorable body. We shall have to submit to the judgment of this court.

We do not wish injustice to be done to the respondent; but the public side of this question, however, should not be ignored. Counsel for the respondent should not—and I do not say he has done so—treat this case as being in the category of an ordinary courthouse trial, criminal in its nature, if you please. The magnitude of this controversy rises into a higher and serener atmosphere than that which usually fills the ordinary criminal courtroom. The public is concerned here more than in an ordinary courthouse trial. Here is one of the judges of one of the appellate courts of our country offering to lay aside his official duties and his judicial functions until next fall.

Mr. President, does that appeal to the Senate? Is it not to be answered by saying that if the case is of such grave nature that he ought not to act in his high office and perform the duties of his position, then the public demands are such that he either ought to be restored to the discharge of his duties or else he ought to be removed from office and another person be designated to discharge those functions?

Were this not a serious case, did it not involve so much, perhaps the suggestion of the honorable counsel to fix the 15th day of October for trial would excite one's risibilities. I dare say, Mr. President, that he little apprehended—I certainly do not apprehend—that the Senate will by any possibility set this case down for trial on the 15th day of October. Courts take judicial notice of public events, for even courts are presumed to know some things without being told. They take judicial notice of an event like a general election. Everybody knows that Senators will not come back here on the 15th day of October and then go home to vote at the November election. So I need not combat the date counsel has named for trial. We do not suggest any date other than that which has been mentioned in the order, and do not suggest any change of that date other than that possibly it might take two or three days longer than the 7th of August to have the process of the Senate executed.

Mr. President, the next session will be a short session, and your public duties and the public duties of the managers require us to take cognizance not only of our present duties but the duties that will confront us next winter. Probably it will occupy some little time to try this case. I have no doubt that you, Mr. President, have tried many a case where there were as many witnesses examined as will be examined here, and as many complicated questions involved as in this case, and I have no doubt you have tried many such complicated cases and disposed of them within three or four days; but I do not apprehend that it will be possible to dispose of this case quite so speedily as that. If, however, it is postponed until the next term of Congress it certainly will draw upon the time and attention of the Senate and a part of the membership of the other House, and, therefore, militate, at least to some degree, against the proper discharge of our public duties. So, then, why not, in the dog days, if you please—in August, while we are here—when the testimony of the witnesses is fresh in the minds of the counsel and fresh in the mind of respondent, and when the pleadings are fresh in the minds of the Senate, when we are ready and prepared to try the case, why not meet this high and responsible duty now?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word or two in reference to some of the matters referred to by Mr. Manager CLAYTON. It certainly will occur to every lawyer who is a member of this tribunal, and it will be clear, I think, to those who are not lawyers, that the mere fact that one particular lawyer in a trial is the spokesman of his side of the case is not evidence that he is prepared to go on and try that case himself. The man who is the spokesman in court is aided by those who do the work outside of the court and in the preparation for trial. The fact, which is apparent here, that Mr. Price and Mr. Martin, practitioners of eminence and long standing, live in the city of Scranton, while the counsel who is referred to as one who did the mere questioning in the case has always lived, during his professional life, in the city of Washington—that mere fact, I say, shows that the real work in the case was done by them. Everyone knows that the work done out of the court was done by them, and they are the persons upon whom the principal reliance of this respondent would be in the trial of this case.

I might here advert to the fact that there are but two of us who have been able to be here, and one is necessarily embarrassed by the fact that he would have difficulty in speaking to this tribunal, because his feelings are so involved on behalf of his father.

I may refer to the fact that on the other side there are no less than seven distinguished lawyers who, as was said here the other day by the Senator from Texas, have won their way to a place on the great law committee of the House, and who have been almost continuously engaged on this case since early in May, or before that time, I believe; and yet, if we may be governed by what we learn in the public prints, as to which I suppose there can be no doubt, these gentlemen have sought the aid of a lawyer, sent down from the Department of Justice, in the preparation of this case, if not in the trial of it; so we have eight counsel opposed to two, and one of those two is embarrassed in the manner to which I have referred.

At this moment, after his application for an immediate trial is before the court, and is about to be passed upon, for the first time we are told by my friend, Mr. Manager CLAYTON, as we now understand, that only the witnesses who were examined before the committee of the House will be examined in the trial—that is, those who are to be examined on behalf of the managers. We learned that at this moment from his lips, but he knows, as everybody knows, that as this trial goes along if it develops that other witnesses are needed to establish the case presented against the respondent they will be subpœnaed and put upon the stand. He will make no bargain here—his duty would not permit him to make any bargain—to examine only those witnesses who were heard before the Judiciary Committee of the House. But the other witnesses are those about whom we are concerned—those who are to answer the statements and charges in the articles of impeachment.

Here my friend falls into error in regard to what I said as to my position. I am not trying to bring on, now, the great question of the constitutionality of any of these articles of impeachment—as to whether they present or any one of them presents a constitutional offense. That is a great question, upon which I do not feel competent to enter at this time, and I do not know that I shall ever feel competent to enter upon it before this tribunal. Nor have I entered into any discussion as to whether the articles which do set forth charges which may be considered impeachable have set them forth in such an indefinite way as to lack legal sufficiency. Those questions will arise at one time or other during the trial. What I say now is that here are two or three articles which are so general in their allegations and so indefinite in their statement that it is impossible for the respondent to come here prepared for trial upon them without inquiring into everything during a long period of years. I will inquire of my associate how many years has Judge Archbald been a Federal judge?

Mr. ROBERT W. ARCHBALD, JR. Ten years.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. For 10 years he has been upon the bench, and no one knows as to what transactions during any one of those long years may be brought up during the trial of this case and the charge made that in some particular transaction he sought to obtain credit by virtue of his position as a judge from those who had or might have litigation before him.

As to matters that have taken place before the Judiciary Committee, it is apparent upon the record, which has been printed and is accessible to everyone, that, as a matter of fact, the principal charges which were presented against this respondent are abandoned here. This case originated in a presentation that was made to the President of the United States by one of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who took a paper to the President on behalf of all the members of that commission. In that paper it was charged that—and this is what we mainly supposed we were to be tried upon—that the respondent, because a man who had a case pending in his court had refused to discount his note, had overruled a demurrer to a bill in equity, which demurrer was filed on behalf of a company in which that man was largely interested.

It was further charged in that paper that this respondent, at the request and upon the demand of counsel for the Lackawanna Railroad Co., had gone to Judge Wetmore, who succeeded the respondent as district judge, and commanded that judge to enter a certain judgment in that case against W. P. Boland, or the company he represented, and that Judge Wetmore had complied with that demand. It was as to such matters that the original charges were brought. But the witnesses who came before the committee so thoroughly demonstrated that there was not the slightest foundation for these charges that they were abandoned. And when the articles of impeachment were actually presented we were surprised to find charges as to the most of which we had supposed it would be impossible that there should be thought to be a proper foundation for prosecution by impeachment in this Chamber. So that we are not prepared, by reason of what has taken place before the Judiciary Committee, to know even what may be proved by the witnesses the managers may summon, and much less what we shall be able to prove in reply.

As to the statement that my client, the respondent, is a lawyer of eminence and ability, that is true; but I have only to remind the Senate of the old adage about the man who undertakes to be his own lawyer.

I am surely surprised, Mr. President, that in considering this application my distinguished friend, the chairman of the managers, should make the argument he has in reference to the remedy of impeachment being imperiled and the question brought before the people whether they should find some other way of getting rid of a judge whom they do not like. The question before this court now is, What is a reasonable time to allow this respondent to prepare for his defense? It is his honor that is involved; and in discussing that question I respectfully submit, Mr. President, it is not proper to consider, and no Member of the Senate should for a moment give any consideration to, the question whether the matter of time which is required properly to present this case to this tribunal will have this, that, or the other effect upon any law of the United States or any paragraph of the Constitution. The greatest principle involved in that Constitution and in the amendments thereto is that every man when brought to trial shall have a right to a fair defense; that he shall be advised of the charges against him and have an opportunity to be represented by counsel properly to prepare and present his case. There is no higher principle in the Constitution of the United States than that; and that is all we are asking. If it shall turn out, because this matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate at this time by the managers who represent the House of Representatives, that to give the respondent a reasonable time will interfere with the duties of the members of the court in reference to the coming election, that is not anything that ought to affect the respondent. The sole question is, What will be fair to him? And when that is decided, I respectfully submit, Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States and the conscience of every member of the court must suggest to him that the thing to be done is to give him such time, regardless of any effect it may have upon the Constitution of the United States or upon any amendment thereof that is now pending or that may be hereafter presented.

Mr. President, that is all that I have to say in reference to what the manager has stated. We submit this matter to the judgment of the Senate, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, anticipating that the decision of this matter will lead to some debate, and as under the rules it must be considered behind closed doors, I move that the doors be closed for the purpose of deliberation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion will be agreed to by unanimous consent. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The managers on the part of the House and the respondent and his counsel having withdrawn from the Chamber, the doors were thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) closed.

At 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m. the doors were reopened.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives entered the Chamber and took the seats assigned them.

The respondent, Judge Robert W. Archbald, accompanied by his counsel, entered the Chamber and took the seats assigned them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit the order which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I submit an order as a substitute for the order submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order submitted by the Senator from Montana will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is ordered that the trial of the accused under these impeachment proceedings and charges be, and is hereby, set for the 15th day of August, 1912, at 12.30 p. m., and that orders for witnesses be filed on or before August 10, 1912, and thereafter as the Senate may order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order asked by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives will also be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

And further ordered, That in case hereafter the managers or the respondent may desire the attendance of additional witnesses, in such case the managers or the respondent may have the witness or witnesses desired subpœnaed, in accordance with the practice and usage of the Senate, upon application in such form as may be approved by the Presiding Officer.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer would inquire whether the counsel for the respondent desires to submit any order?

Mr. WORTHINGTON. No, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The several orders are before the Senate for consideration. Under the view taken by the Presiding Officer, the question should first be put on the order fixing the most distant time. That is in accordance with parliamentary procedure and also in accordance with such procedure as might be considered proper in a court. The order proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is the one which fixes the longest period, and the vote will first be taken upon that. The rule of the Senate requires that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays. It is therefore not necessary that the yeas and nays should be ordered as in other instances. As Senators' names are called, those who favor the date fixed by the order proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will vote "yea." Those who are opposed to that date and favor other dates will, as their names are called, vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary having called the roll, the result was announced—yeas 44, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Bankhead	Crawford	Kern	Root
Borah	Cullom	Lodge	Sanders
Bourne	Cummins	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Fall	Massey	Smith, S. C.

Clarke, Ark.	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Gore	Oliver	Stephenson
Curtis	Heyburn	Owen	Watson
Davis	Hitchcock	Paynter	Williams
Dixon	Kenyon	Percy

So Mr. GALLINGER's order was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer would inquire whether the managers on the part of the House have anything further to submit to the Senate at this time?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Mr. President, as a matter of information, the managers desire to know when it is contemplated that they shall furnish the list of witnesses. I should like for that part of the order to be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again report the order.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That a list of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. The order does not say when the list is to be furnished. That is what I wished to ascertain. It leaves that entirely to the judgment of the managers and to the judgment of respondent. Am I correct in that contention, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer will respond that there is no designation in the order as to what shall be done in that regard, evidently leaving it as the manager concludes.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I have not a calendar before me, but I presume the 3d day of December is the first Monday in December, the day for the regular convening of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed it is Tuesday, the second day of the session.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. It is the second day of the session?

Mr. LODGE. Monday is the 2d day of December.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 3d of December is the second day of the session.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Then, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment having decided that this case shall not be tried at this time, but that it shall be tried beginning on the 3d day of December next, the managers of the House respectfully bow to the decision of the Senate, and beg to inform the Senate that they will be here on the 3d day of December ready to proceed with the trial of this case.

In the meantime, on behalf of the managers of the House, I desire to say that the managers will furnish—I presume that it ought to be furnished to the Secretary of the Senate—a list of the witnesses whom the managers desire to have subpœnaed on behalf of the prosecution, if I may so term the side which is occupied by the managers on the part of the House. Am I correct in the view that we shall furnish this list to the Secretary of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer is not advised as to what are the precedents, but as the Sergeant at Arms is to execute the order, the Chair will suggest that the Sergeant at Arms is the proper person to whom the list should be supplied.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Then, Mr. President, under the intimation of the Chair, the managers beg to say at this time that they will in due time furnish the Sergeant at Arms a list of the witnesses they desire subpœnaed, and they expect to be ready, by having the witnesses here and ready otherwise, to proceed with the cause, if it meets the pleasure of the Senate, on the 3d day of December next.

Mr. President, there is one other thing that the managers desire to know. There is no settled practice, it appears from my rather imperfect examination of the precedents in the case, but I have reached the conclusion from such examination as I have been able to make that after this list is furnished by the managers and the list furnished on behalf of the respondent by the respondent that then it is the practice or the usage of the Senate, under, I suppose, certain discretion vested in the Presiding Officer, to entertain and to direct the issuance of subpœnas for other witnesses whose names may not appear on the list which is furnished in the first instance; and believing that to be the practice and believing that the managers should have that right, I shall not insist upon the proposition which I offered in the beginning of the cause to-day; that is, to provide that these additional witnesses might be subpœnaed on application made by the managers or the respondent, as the case might be, but that the application should be made to the Presiding Officer, the Presiding Officer having the discretion and presumably the authority to grant a request for additional witnesses.

Putting that interpretation upon the matter, Mr. President, we shall not ask any amendment of the order at this time, for it is presumed that this court, like any court that wants to do justice in the premises, would, notwithstanding any rule to the contrary, or because of the absence of any positive rule making provision for such an emergency, direct the subpœna of witnesses if, in the judgment of the court, it ought to be done to meet the manifest ends of justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the manager has stated the practice as it is understood and contemplated by the Senate in that regard.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. Then, Mr. President, the managers at this time have no further business before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

The managers on the part of the House thereupon retired from the Chamber.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that when the court adjourns it adjourn to meet on the 3d of December next at 12.30 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming moves that when the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the case of Robert W. Archbald, adjourns it adjourn to meet at 12.30 o'clock on the 3d day of December next. Without objection it is unanimously so ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to propound an inquiry. The Presiding Officer, in other words, the Senator who shall preside, I presume is to attach his signature to the subpœnas for witnesses. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senate to Rule VII, which will be read for the information of the Senate as to the power of the Presiding Officer to issue subpœnas.

The Secretary read as follows:

VII. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the Presiding Officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate are sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the Presiding Officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision. (Rule VII of the Rules for Impeachment Trials, page 175 of the Manual.)

Mr. ROOT. I suggest that the fifth rule is relevant to the question.

Mr. STONE. What I desired to ascertain was——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair, handling the book carelessly, did not call attention to the proper rule. The rule which has been read also states what duties shall devolve upon the Presiding Officer, but the particular rule is the one indicated by the Senator from New York, Rule V, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

V. The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules, or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide. (Rule V, at the bottom of page 174.)

Mr. STONE. Then under the rule the Vice President will be the Presiding Officer who would sign all writs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Whoever is the Presiding Officer at the time the writ is required would in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair be clothed with that power.

Mr. STONE. Would the present occupant of the chair be clothed with that power during the vacation? Application for the issue of subpœnas for witnesses will be made during the vacation of the Senate in all probability; probably in November. It puzzles me a little bit to know who would sign those writs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think there is any trouble at all about it. The Vice President, of course, will be during the vacation the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and if the Senate should indicate anyone else to be President pro tempore during that time, the power would be exercised in the first instance by the Vice President or, if he should be under disability, by the President pro tempore, whoever he might be. That is the opinion of the Chair. He may be wrong about it.

The respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I move that the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adjourn, and that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously adopted, until Tuesday, December 3, 1912, at 12.30 o'clock p. m.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is in legislative session.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who is chairman of the Senate conferees on the wool bill, when it is his intention to present the conference report on the wool bill (H. R. 22195) for action by the Senate. I think the Senate ought to know what time a matter of that importance is proposed to be taken up.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, answering the inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will say that on Monday, at 12 o'clock, I will lay before the Senate the conference report on the bill known as the wool bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to have noted on the calendar, among the other notices, that the conference report on the wool bill will be submitted to the Senate at 12 o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, without objection.

THE PARCEL POST (S. DOC. NO. 895).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask leave to present a memorial, which I have not had time to examine, it having just been handed to me, prepared by George P. Hampton, secretary of the Farmers' National Committee on Postal Reform and secretary of the Postal Express Federation, setting forth, on behalf of the organized farmers of the country, certain views on the parcel post. I request that it be printed in the RECORD. I am informed that it contains matter which will be useful to Senators in the discussion of that paragraph in the bill when it is reached.

Mr. GALLINGER. And also as a document.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I will also ask that it be printed as a public document, and laid on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the paper presented by him may be printed in the RECORD, and also separately as a document for the use of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The memorial referred to is as follows:

MEMORIAL PRESENTING THE FARMERS' POSITION ON PARCEL POST AND IN FAVOR OF AMENDMENTS TO THE BOURNE BILL.

[By George P. Hampton, secretary Farmers' National Committee on Postal Reform; secretary Postal Express Federation.]

To the honorable United States Senate:

The postal appropriation bill with its provisions for parcel-post legislation is now before you for action, and on behalf of the organized farmers of the country, I desire to submit for your consideration a final word on their desires as to parcel-post legislation and their objections to the parcel-post section of the bill—commonly spoken of as the Bourne bill—as it now stands.

The speech delivered in the Senate on July 23 by the Hon. ORADIAH GARDNER, of Maine, and printed in the RECORD of that date, clearly sets forth the views of the farmers as to what constitutes an adequate general parcel post, and we respectfully urge you to give this speech your careful consideration. I beg to differ from the statement made in the committee report (No. 955, p. 16) that "neither has the public in mind government ownership of express companies." The farmer organizations are practically unanimous in their demands for a postal express founded on the absorption of the express companies' package business as set forth in Senate bill No. 5474. Senator GARDNER submitted abundant evidence in his speech to prove this. We have not urged that legislation should be enacted at this session providing for establishing the postal express, but we have urged that the investigations so well begun in Congress should be continued by the appointment of a joint committee of the House and Senate, said committee to report at the next session. We have urged further that whatever legislation is enacted at this session should be considered merely as a beginning, and that no limited parcel-post measure could be accepted as meeting the reasonable expectations of the people which did not provide in unmistakable language for:

(a) The handling of farm products;

(b) For the regulation of rates, weights, and zones by the Postmaster General, subject to the review or order of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

(c) For the appointment of a joint committee, above referred to, to continue the investigations.

The Bourne bill is unsatisfactory as it stands even as a beginning. I submit the main objections:

(1) It does not contain the above provisions.

(2) Measured by the Government cost the short-distance rates (the rates for city and rural routes excepted) are exorbitant and penalize the short-distance shipper and subsidize the long-distance shipper.

(3) The rates proposed are, in the main, higher than the express rates for corresponding distances—so high in fact as to give over all the most profitable business to the express companies.

From the data furnished in the report on the Post Office appropriation bill (Rept. No. 955), I have compiled the following tables, which show the injustice and impracticability of the rates of the Bourne bill, except the local rates for city and rural routes which we indorse.

Column 1, Bourne bill rate.

Column 2, express rate on the average.

Express-rate zone No. 1 includes all territory east of the Mississippi River north of Washington, D. C., the southern boundary of Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, except Michigan north of Grand Rapids, Wisconsin north of Milwaukee, and Minnesota.

All the Bourne rates below the line dividing the table into two parts are higher than the express rates, making competition with the express companies impossible.

The Bourne bill rate on 11 pounds for 150 miles is 57 cents; the express rate for the same distance is 28 cents, or less than half.

In the 50-mile zone all rates for weights above 6 pounds are above the competing point with the express companies.

In the 150-mile zone all rates for weights above 5 pounds are above the competing point.

In the 300-mile zone all rates for weights above 4 pounds are above the competing point.

In the 600-mile zone, and in all succeeding zones up to 2,000 miles, all rates for weights above 3 pounds are above the competing point.

That is to say, that all the best part of the territory and all the best part of the business is surrendered to the express companies.

If this were necessary in order to provide self-sustaining rates, there would be some excuse for such rates, but in some instances the rates are considerably over 100 per cent above cost, and this, too, after the liberal profit on overhead charges provided by Senator BOURNE has been figured in the cost. A comparison of the Bourne rates with the Government cost shows the injustices of the Bourne bill rates, and by including in the comparison the express rates which the parcel post must meet in competition we can see how much lower it is perfectly feasible to make rates yielding the Government a good profit. To complete the comparison we should add the rates which taking over the express company contracts would make feasible.

In the tables which follow the Bourne bill rates for 5 and 10 pounds are submitted in comparison with—

(a) The new express rates;

(b) The Government cost;

(c) Rates feasible under present railway mail contracts; and

(d) Rates feasible with the postal-express rates provided for in the Gardner bill (S. 5474).

1. Express rates ordered by Interstate Commerce Commission in zone No. 1 (including all territory east of the Mississippi River north of Washington, D. C.; southern boundary of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri, except Michigan north of Grand Rapids; Wisconsin north of Milwaukee and Madison; and Minnesota).

2. Government cost under present railway mail contracts compiled from the official data in Senate Report No. 955 on post office appropriation bill.

3. Rates based on Government cost, so as to provide self-sustaining rates of real service to the people and competitive with the express rates, so far as practicable, under present railway mail contracts.

4. Rates feasible with the postal express proposed in the Gardner bill (S. 5474).

These tables I submit demonstrate—

(1) The impracticability of the Bourne bill.

(2) That compared with cost the Bourne bill rates are unnecessarily high.

(3) That rates insuring the Government a good margin of profit can be formulated that are lower than the corresponding express rates in a large part of the territory, namely:

(a) For the 5 pounds up to 800 miles and fairly competitive up to 1,000 miles; and

(b) For the 10 pounds up to 200 miles and fairly competitive up to 400 miles.

(4) The impossibility of making rates under the existing railway contracts that can compare with express rates in the long hauls up to 2,000 miles.

(5) The tremendous advantage the Government would have in making postal express rates if it secured the express railway contracts as provided for in the Gardner bill (S. 5474).

I call your attention to the following from Senator BOURNE's report (p. 12, Rept. No. 955):

"The department estimates that it costs the Government under existing conditions and contracts $0.00258 to transport 1 pound of fourth-class matter 50 miles. One cent is our smallest unit of money; hence if we make any transportation charge for 50 miles it is necessary to make a cent-per-pound charge, although giving the Government nearly 300 per cent profit on the transportation charge. There will not be so large a profit on the handling charge."

What kind of a show would any express company have before the Interstate Commerce Commission if it was demonstrated that it had 300 per cent profit in the transportation charge of any of its rates in addition to a profit, though not so large, in the handling charge? Surely this can not be called scientific rate making. I call your attention also to the important fact that this enormous profit had reference to the rates proposed in the first Bourne bill. If adding 1 cent per pound to the 50-mile zone rate gave the Government a transportation profit of nearly 300 per cent, what profit does the Government get by adding 2 cents instead of 1, as is the case in the rates adopted?

The evidence is conclusive that the rates proposed for the 50-mile zone in the first Bourne bill would give the Government a good margin of profit in a zone of 200 miles. I submit the figures in comparison with the Government cost up to 200 miles.

Bourne bill rate for 50-mile zone compared with Government cost for 50, 100, 150, and 200 miles.

Bourne bill rate for 50-mile zone originally proposed	6	8	10	12	14	16	18	20	22	24	26

The rates proposed by the report for the 50-mile zone with the single exception of the 1-pound rate are equal to the Government cost at 450 miles, and the original Bourne bill rates for the same zone are equal to the cost for the first pound for a distance of 600 miles, for the second pound over 400 miles, for the third and fourth pounds over 350 miles, and for all the weights over 4 pounds over 300 miles. If these original Bourne bill rates for the 50-mile zone were adopted for a first zone of 200 miles, it would provide lower rates than the express rates and give the Government control of all small package trade within a 200 mile radius and yield the Government a profit within all that territory of an average of over 100 per cent above cost. The tables show that the profit would be on an average of 80 per cent computing the business entirely on packages at the full maximum weight, whereas the greatest bulk of the packages are but fractions of these maximum weights and the Government profit on these fractions is so enormous as in the judgment of many experts to be amply sufficient to yield the Government a big profit, even if rates were computed at the actual cost of the maximum weights and distances. In the face of such possibilities of making profit-producing rates lower than the corresponding express rates, what justification can there be for "jumping" the rates to a much higher level than the rates at first proposed instead of reducing them to a competing level with express rates? While no doubt not intended, it is a surrender to the express companies and a guarantee of protection to them in their monopoly. The committee devotes six lines in the report to a justification. I quote:

"There was also a fear on the part of some that the proposed rates would not be self-sustaining. Partly because of this and party because of the desire to give the local merchants more protection against catalogue houses the rates for the shorter distances were slightly raised, as will be seen by reference to the printed bill."

The short-distance rates are raised enormously above cost, while the long-distance rates remain the same, thus bringing the rates proposed more nearly to the level of a general flat rate, and yet the argument is seriously put forth that it is to give the local merchant more protection against catalogue houses. If increasing the short-distance rates will protect the local merchant, why not increase it to the level of the flat rate? If the argument is sound, it would be more honest to abolish the zone system entirely. The vital essence of a perfect zone system is rates in each zone based on cost, and to increase the short-haul rates away above cost and ever so much higher than competing express rates is to destroy the tremendous advantages of the zone principle. And we are asked to accept this as scientific rate making, and the people are to be compelled to accept such a bill without any power of review for the readjustment of rates or correction of such glaring errors, until another Congress under stress of aroused public opinion makes the revision and establishes a parcel post on true scientific lines.

The postal railway pay is shown to be about 1 cent (0.01032) per pound for 200 miles (report, p. 12). Why, then, if the country is to be given a square deal, is not 200 miles fixed as the maximum limit of each zone if the 1 cent increase per pound of transportation costs is to be made the basis of division of the country into zones? One hundred miles would be better, so as to make the change in the larger weights average 5 cents instead of 10 cents or more. If this were done it would provide rates as nearly competitive with the express rates as they could be made under the present railway mail pay, while yielding the Government larger profits than are possible under the Bourne rates.

The fact is that it is impossible to establish under present railway mail contracts a parcel post based on any scientific theory of rate making that will be self-sustaining in all cases or provide rates in all cases as low as express rates. The Government must have a transportation cost as low as that of the express companies before that is possible. If your committee, then, having refused to consider the postal express, finds itself under the necessity of making a 12-cents-a-pound rate in all the territory above 1,800 miles, although such a rate is away below cost. I respectfully submit that such rates should be frankly allowed to stand on their own merits and the Government made openly to stand such loss as the business developed may involve. The report shows that the losses would be insignificant even if they actually occurred, as all the territory within 2,200 miles would yield a profit, and that constitutes (excluding Alaska) the bulk of the territory. But whatever the loss, there is absolutely no justification in saddling it on to the farmers and local merchants. Congress should not tolerate any jugglery with the short-haul rates so as to rob the short-distance shipper to make up this loss. That is taxing the many for the benefit of the few. As I have pointed out in previous memorials to your honorable body (S. Doc. No. 557) and in my testimony before the committee, "the farmer, the consumer, and the local merchant have a common interest in the cheapest possible service for the short haul. They have little or no interest in the long haul. The retail trade between the consumer and the merchant is essentially a short-distance proposition. The prosperity of all these will be best served by making the lowest possible rates for the short haul." A zone system that can not be established without increasing the cost of service in any zone can not be called scientific, and one that makes the charge on the short haul outrageously excessive in order to recoup the Government for losses on the long haul at rates away below cost is undemocratic, violates every principle of square dealing, and is against public welfare. To make fair comparison with corresponding express rates Senator Bourne has presented a distance table divided into 36 zones. The express rates, both old and those ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, vary even in the larger weights a few cents for short distances. If long experience has taught the express companies that these fine gradations are necessary, why has it not been considered worth while to provide for corresponding gradations in the postal service by providing for administrative regulation if experience proved such gradations desirable? The main protest against the Bourne bill rates are their inflexible rigidity and lack of provision for readjustment without recourse to Congress if the zones and rates now adopted should prove defective in any particular. That the rates proposed in the bill are defective is beyond dispute.

Senator BOURNE says the appointment of a joint committee is unnecessary. On this point the report states:

"We do not submit this substitute as being perfect in all its provisions, but believe that it is approximately scientific in its plan, and that a committee appointed at the beginning of the summer vacation, while a political campaign is in progress, would not, in the four months allotted for the work, add anything of material importance to the information already gathered by a subcommittee of this committee in the investigation which has been conducted during a period of over 11 months, or that such a committee would be able to devise a better plan than that which we respectfully submit."

I respectfully submit that the bill reported by the committee and the committee report are all sufficient evidence of the desirability of the appointment of a joint committee. The bill reported can hardly be considered "approximately scientific," as the report states, for it is plainly an eleventh-hour compromise. It has rates excessively high as compared with the rates of the original Bourne bill which, we must assume, expressed the ripened judgment of Senator BOURNE. The rates of the first bill had received the unqualified indorsement of the Postmaster General. Why, then, were they "jumped" to a much higher lever, a level which the cost statement of the report shows to be wholly unjustifiable and which put them away above the express rates which will go into effect in October? The zones have been changed, and the third-class consolidation has been abandoned. Surely you can not consider these changes, suddenly made on the eve of reporting the bill, as scientifically made, and surely you must admit that changes of such importance so suddenly made are worthy of the most careful consideration by a committee of experts, such as the joint committee would be. There are other grave objections to the bill as reported. It is not only unscientific as to its zone adjustments, but the Robinson plan for determining distances, while admirable in its basic features, is crude and unwieldy in the way the details have been worked out. The evidence is conclusive that it can be greatly simplified, its efficiency increased, and the cost reduced. Surely these are matters worthy of final review by a joint committee.

Another objection of Senator BOURNE to the appointment of a joint committee is that the political distraction would make the work of the committee ineffectual. I respectfully submit that the political turmoil which might prevent any general consideration of parcel-post measures during the next four months by a special joint committee has been continuous during the present session of Congress. Conditions have been such as to absolutely prevent many Senators and Congressmen from weighing all the evidence that should be considered before final action is taken on a matter of such vital importance. If Senator BOURNE is confident that he has produced a bill which will stand the test of time, we are unable to understand why he should oppose the appointment of the special joint committee or the addition of the provision giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to amend rates and zones, should experience and investigation prove such changes to be desirable. While it is true that an immense amount of valuable data fully covering the subject has been accumulated and is now available in Government documents, little of it beyond that presented by the postal-express advocates is in available form for ready reference by Members of Congress. All the really valuable matter is practically buried in a mass of other matter of no reference value, and if the joint committee is appointed, experts could well occupy the time until after the general election putting this matter into available form, and by a proper codification and index make the matter bearing on any feature of the subject instantly available. Then the briefing of the matter would be comparatively easy, and with these briefs in hand and data available for verification or reference the joint committee could do more effective work in a few weeks than has hitherto been possible.

I append a table of Government costs, together with rates for zones 200 miles apart which would yield the Government a big profit. In my judgment they are the highest rates that should be tolerated in beginning a zone system, and if established, with the other amendments urged, would make a beginning we all could indorse.

Competing express rates in last zone showing the small volume of business the post office would have at the 12-cent-a-pound rate in any event.

2,750 miles	29	37	46	55	63	72	115	89	98	106	115

At 2,150 miles express rates are lower than Bourne bill rates on all weights above 3 pounds.

At 2,500 miles express rates are lower than Bourne bill rates on all weights above 4 pounds.

At 2,750 miles express rates are lower than Bourne bill rates on all weights above 6 pounds.

As express rates provide c. o. d. privileges, insurance, etc., the advantages in favor of the express are such that there is no prospect of parcel-post business at these distances above 3 pounds at a 12-cent per pound rate. The farmer, the consumer, and the local merchant are not interested in the long-distance haul, so there will be no increase of business in the last zone from the extension of the service to villages and rural routes. The amount of parcel-post business in this zone in all distances below 3,000 miles would be negligible.

The estimates of profit in each zone in the above table do not take into account the profit the Government would have in the fractional weights. The average weight of a package is about one-half pound below the maximum weight, and as the Government mail pay at 2,500 miles is 12.9 cents per pound, there would be a further saving to the estimated cost of 6.4 cents in each zone. This would bring the 1 and 2 pound rates in the last zone to show a profit of 2½ and 1 cent, respectively, and would reduce the average loss for all weights to approximately one-quarter of 1 cent per pound, a loss so small that it would be more than made up by the profit in the liberally computed costs of the overhead charges. The profit to the Government in each zone, by allowing a half-pound reduction in the railway mail pay for the fractional weight of the average package, would be 30 per cent in the 1,000-mile zone, 26 per cent in the 1,200-mile zone, 24 per cent in the 1,400-mile zone, 22 per cent in the 1,600-mile zone, 20 per cent in the 1,800-mile zone, and 16 per cent in the 2,000-mile zone. Thus such a series of zones as we have suggested can be operated without any loss and be brought within the range of competition with the express companies. Even such rates as these should not be enacted into law without provision for their regulation by the administrative branch of the Government. They are outrageously high as compared with the feasible postal-express rates, as a comparison of these rates with the table in Senator GARDNER'S speech and the brief comparison I have made herein will show. The great snag in the way of making really low rates is the railway mail pay on hauls of over 400 miles. The average railway mail pay for 2,500 miles is $258 per ton. The old express company pay to railroads for the same distance on a 10-pound package is less than $140 per ton and under the new rate less than $94 per ton. Is it not in the public interest for Congress to take into consideration this enormous difference in railway pay in its efforts to establish profitable long-haul rates? We ask for a joint committee to carefully consider these things, and on this point we desire to unqualifiedly indorse the statement of Senator BOURNE on page 14 of the report, namely:

"Formation of legislative commissions or committees, rather than delegating the power to administrative commissions, appeals to me most strongly. I feel that all governmental problems requiring legislation should be worked out through ascertainment studies conducted by joint committees of the two branches of Congress. Thus is insured the appearance on the floor of both Houses of the individuals directing the method of ascertainment, and being the authors of the deductions and recommendations based on the same."

I repeat and can not impress on you too strongly that the farmers are not opposing parcel-post legislation, even if the rates are outrageous and unfair. Our protest is against the ironclad provisions that make the Bourne bill a finality, absolutely prohibiting any readjustment as errors are detected and experience proves their necessity, and the elimination of the House provision for a joint committee. On these points Senator GARDNER voices the sentiment of the farmers in his speech. I quote.

"No parcel post or postal express legislation will be satisfactory in practice that does not provide for administrative control over the adjusting of rates and weight limits, and the other conditions of traffic movement, as experience in practical operation may demonstrate to be necessary to move the traffic and give the best service. With such provisions properly safeguarded to protect the public from administrative abuses, Congress can, regardless of widely divergent opinions on these features, enact a parcel post or postal express bill which, whatever the rates, weights, and zones first put into effect may be, will give the country almost immediately the best postal-package system of any country. Instead of following haltingly behind other nations, this great Republic should at once take the place of leader among the nations of the world in providing the best possible form of public service for the benefit of its people. There has been considerable criticism indulged in by the public press and by some Members of this Congress as to who would be responsible for the failure of Congress at this session to enact a parcel-post bill regardless of whether it meets public needs or not. I want to go on record right here that those Senators and Members of the House alone are responsible who insist upon a rigid bill as to rates, weights, and zones, and who refuse to incorporate several indispensable elements to a working system, or support any parcel-post or postal-express bill that provides for their administrative regulation. On them must rest the responsibility if this Congress fails to enact adequate legislation on this matter so vitally important to the prosperity of the whole people."

And again:

"Mr. President, 90,000,000 of people are to be directly affected by the adoption of parcel-post legislation. The great consuming public will bear a heavier burden or become a larger beneficiary as an inadequate or adequate parcel post is established. Are the 49,000,000 of people in our cities and towns to have the advantage of a low transportation charge for the small shipment? Are the forty-odd millions in our agricultural sections to have the relief from unequal transportation facilities that they have been asking of Congress for years? Gentlemen, the eyes of these people are now turned upon the Senate. They believe they have a right in demanding recognition of their needs. They do not ask that the Senate spend the rest of the summer discussing this subject. They do not want the Senate to accept any old bill bearing the name of "parcel post" in an attempt to satisfy them or make political capital. They do want the Senate to give this question, which is all important to them, the attention its importance requires. They are willing that Congress should take the time necessary to obtain the best parcel-post system. They are satisfied that the House of Representatives has honestly tried to meet their demands and in the action it has taken is trying to grant their demands, but they are determined that their efforts to secure a real, workable parcel post, as good as that enjoyed by Germany, shall be crowned with success."

The preliminary work for establishing a general parcel post has been well done so far as it has gone; but the joint committee is, in our judgment, absolutely necessary to complete the work in order to insure a general parcel post of real service to the people. We therefore respectfully urge that the parcel-post section of the appropriation bill be amended to include the amendments urged in this memorial.

Respectfully submitted.

RAILROAD, TELEGRAPH, AND TELEPHONE FRANCHISES IN PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 894).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 32 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the Executive Council of Porto Rico, which are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me. Such of these as relate to railroad, street railway, telegraph, and telephone franchises, privileges, or concessions have been approved by me, as required by the joint resolution of May 1, 1900 (31 Stat., 715).

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 3, 1912.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4663. An act granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 15509. An act to authorize the construction of a sewer pipe upon and across the Fort Rodman Military Reservation at New Bedford, Mass.; and

H. R. 24450. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I believe the pending question is upon the adoption of the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill (H. R. 24023).

Mr. LODGE. I hope action will not be demanded on that report. It is 6 o'clock; we have been in session about seven hours; and the attendance in the Senate is very thin. There is a matter involved in the conference report which I regard of very great importance—the matter affecting the tenure of the civil service—on which I wish to be heard briefly. I have no desire to detain the Senate unreasonably, but I think it is a matter too important to be disposed of at this moment. There are other Senators, I know, who desire to be heard on it, and I hope the Senator will not press it at this time.

Mr. WARREN. That is the pending question. While I did not expect to demand, or could not demand, a vote it seemed to me that in the press of business we are under, when last night we had an evening session, we might run on for a half hour or an hour and try to dispose of some of the pending business. We have at the desk some other conference reports, all of which are important.

If the Senator will allow me, I want to say that, with the rumors that have circulated for the last 20 or 30 days as to what might happen to this bill in a certain quarter, it does seem to me if we expect to get through in any reasonable season this summer we ought to improve all the time possible and dispose of this bill in some manner, so that we may get to the end of the lane.

I have no desire to cut anyone off; I simply desire to transact the public business as rapidly as possible.

Mr. LODGE. I sympathize fully with the Senator's desire. I have not done anything, I think, to delay the transaction of the public business, but this is a very important matter. The debate was stopped in the middle by the impeachment proceedings. As I said, I desire to say something on that point, and there are other Senators I know who desire to say something about it. I shall be very brief, but it is a matter upon which we ought to have a vote. Many Senators have already gone. I think on a matter of such importance it might well go over.

I have no desire to prevent the Senate from sitting and disposing of other conference reports. If there are other reports to which there is no objection, I shall be only too glad to stay for that purpose, but this one I hope may be allowed to go over until Monday.

Mr. WARREN. The conference report that follows this one will probably provoke discussion too. I want earnestly to express my readiness and my anxiety to bring to a close the consideration of these measures, but if the Senate is unwilling to proceed I am helpless of course, and I shall be obliged to lay it aside. According to the notice just elicited by the inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, there will come up on Monday a privileged question which is of even higher privilege perhaps than the laid-over report, that of another conference committee.

I can only say that I give notice now that I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration and finish of this conference report immediately after the conference report is presented, notice of which has just been given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is any business to be brought up I will withdraw it. But there is no quorum here to do business.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BOURNE. I understand that the Post Office appropriation bill, under the unanimous-consent agreement, was before the Senate when I yielded to the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I was going to suggest that we adjourn to meet on Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept that and move that the Senate adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. PENROSE. Had there not better be made a regular order for meeting next week at 10 o'clock?

Mr. BOURNE. I would be glad to have that done.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that hereafter the hour of meeting of the Senate be 10 o'clock a. m., until otherwise ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. We adopted just two days ago an order to meet at 11 o'clock, and if agreeable to the Senator I should like to have him let it go over until Monday. I think we can have an agreement then to make the hour of meeting 10 o'clock, and we will adjourn to-night to meet on Monday at 10 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate do now adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock Monday morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 5, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 3, 1912.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, we would approach Thee in the spirit of Him who taught us to pray: Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4663) granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15509. An act to authorize the construction of a sewer pipe upon and across the Fort Rodman Military Reservation at New Bedford, Mass.; and

H. R. 24450. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4663. An act granting to the Washington-Oregon Corporation a right for an electric railroad, and for telephone, telegraph, and electric-transmission lines across the Vancouver Military Reservation, in the State of Washington.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LLOYD rose.

The SPEAKER. The special order for to-day is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] shall have an hour, immediately after the approval of the Journal, in which to answer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is to occupy half an hour on some matters, and that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will present a conference report, I yield.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there is no understanding about the matter, but I have no objection to the gentleman temporarily yielding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule, if it came up at all, that the conference report would have the right of way over everything.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report in respect to an election-contest case, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, which I would like to present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to yield the right of way for the conference report, unless I understand what the gentleman desires.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It is the case of Jodoin against Higgins.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman wants to make a report?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes; and to move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then the understanding is that I am to proceed after that is over, and after the gentleman from Missouri presents the matter from the Committee on Accounts, to take not to exceed 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Alabama presents the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The strict letter of the rule is that the gentleman may proceed now, but the understanding is that as soon as the matter referred to by the gentleman from New York is attended to, and the gentleman from Missouri presents a resolution, and the gentleman from Alabama gets through with the conference report, the gentleman from Texas may proceed.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF JODOIN AGAINST HIGGINS.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 3, I present a privileged report in the case of Raymond J. Jodoin against Edwin W. Higgins, a contested-election case from the third congressional district of the State of Connecticut, and move the adoption of the resolutions recommended by the committee, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 661 (H. Rept. 1136).

Resolved, That Raymond J. Jodoin was not elected a Member of the Sixty-second Congress from the third congressional district of Connecticut and is not entitled to a seat therein.

House resolution 662 (H. Rept. 1136).

Resolved, That Edwin W. Higgins was elected a Member of the Sixty-second Congress from the third congressional district of Connecticut and is entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that this is a unanimous report, and unless objection is made the Chair will put the motion on both resolutions. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

HERMAN GAUSS.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 562 (H. Rept. 1133).

Resolved, That there be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Herman Gauss the sum of $600 for expert and extra services rendered to the Committee on Invalid Pensions from March 4 until October 8, 1911, as examiner by detail from the Pension Bureau, pursuant to law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ALLEN D. ALBERT.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 555 (H. Rept. 1134).

Resolved, That there be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Allen D. Albert the sum of $1,200 for services rendered to the Committee on Invalid Pensions for the second session of the Sixty-second Congress as examiner by detail from the Pension Bureau, pursuant to law.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment to that resolution which I desire to offer, to strike out, in lines 2 and 3, the words "one thousand two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six," so that it will read "$600" instead of "$1,200."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that it is customary to give $500 to these examiners.

Mr. LLOYD. No; $600.

Mr. MANN. I have looked at it, and I think it is in the usual form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is customary to include $500 in the appropriation bill, and has been for years, for Mr. Gauss.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York is mistaken about that. Mr. Gauss was paid in the last Congress $2,400.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, in order that that may be understood, Mr. Gauss has heretofore been allowed from time to time through the Committee on Accounts $1,200 for his services for several years past. He began service in this Congress on the 4th of March of last year and concluded on the 8th day of October of last year, covering a period of about seven months, for which time he asks $600. That has been allowed in previous resolutions.

Now, this resolution provides pay for Mr. Albert, who has performed duty during this session of Congress, and allows the same amount of $600.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution in lines 2 and 3 by striking out "$1,200" and inserting "$600."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JOSEPH M. M'COY.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 559 (H. Rept. 1137).

Resolved, That there be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Joseph M. McCoy, the sum of $1,200 for services rendered to the Committee on Pensions for the first and second sessions of the Sixty-second Congress as examiner by detail from the Pension Bureau, pursuant to law.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, the committee offers the following amendment: In line 3, strike out the words "two hundred," so that the resolution will provide for the payment of $1,000 instead of $1,200.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the resolution by striking out, in line 3, the words "two hundred."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

STEEL TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 632 (H. Rept. 1135).

Resolved, That the sum of $1,000 shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, on vouchers ordered by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted May 16, 1911, to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the United States Steel Corporation, or other corporations or persons, of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the acts supplementary thereto, the various interstate-commerce acts, and the acts relative to the national banking associations, etc.; and that all vouchers ordered by said committee shall be signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, is this the final allowance for the steel investigating committee?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much does it make altogether?

Mr. STANLEY. Thirty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky know how much the printing bill has amounted to?

Mr. STANLEY. That is not presented to this committee.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. STANLEY. There is a resolution for 10,000 copies of the hearings. Those hearings were not sent out on the instance of members of the committee, only 200 or 300 of them. They were only sent out on requests, and we received requests for about 5,000 daily.

Mr. MANN. How many were printed?

Mr. STANLEY. There were some 6,000 printed, just enough to keep ahead. The rest will be printed and bound and be for distribution. There was an authorization for 10,000.

Mr. MANN. I think there was an authorization for 10,000, but I do not think it was understood they would all be printed unless required.

Mr. STANLEY. I think the authorization gave the right to print and bind the rest if necessary.

Mr. MANN. I do not so recall, but the gentleman may be correct. Has there been any estimate at the Printing Office of what the amount of printing is?

Mr. STANLEY. I have not received such estimate.

Mr. MANN. What occasion is there for binding 5,000?

Mr. STANLEY. There will not be that many. The pamphlet form, with back numbers, continues to come in. I think I have received 600 or 800 requests already for copies in bound form from various sources.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Does this provide for the printing?

Mr. LLOYD. This has nothing to do with the printing.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

CHARLES L. WILLIAMS AND MARSHALL PICKERING.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, House resolution 565.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 565.

Resolved, That there shall be paid to Charles L. Williams and Marshall Pickering, respectively, as special messengers in the majority and minority caucus rooms, $1,200 per annum each.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, for how long—forever?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York seems to be asking the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. LLOYD. I did not hear his question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman how long this is to be.

Mr. LLOYD. One year.

Mr. MANN. This is only an authorization. The gentleman from New York will have to settle that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood it to provide for the payment.

Mr. LLOYD. No; it is just an authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

STEEL TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at 11 o'clock, the House convene and proceed with the consideration of the report of the majority (H. Rept. 1127) and the various reports of the minority investigating the affairs of the steel corporation—it would perhaps be more proper to say a discussion of it—from 11 o'clock until 5, and then to consider it at a night session from 8 o'clock until 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that on next Thursday——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky in his request to except from the order conference reports and appropriation bills. I do not think we can agree to any order at this time that would give anything the right of way over conference reports and appropriation bills.

Mr. STANLEY. I accept the suggestion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have had before the House the consideration of H. R. 23673, the seamen's bill, all of which has been read, I believe, except two paragraphs. To me this is emergency legislation, and I believe that this House is properly going to be open to just criticism unless the bill is taken up and passed in time for the Senate to act upon it before Congress adjourns. This is largely due to the fact that we have recently had the great ocean disaster, with the loss of many lives, which a law of this kind, had it been passed before that disaster, would have averted. The lives of many seamen are jeopardized under the present system, and it seems to me that this House ought to find time in the very near future, not later than next Thursday, at least, to take up and pass that bill. It should not take more than an hour's time. Therefore I would like to ask especially the Democratic Members of the House, as well as those on the Republican side who are interested in this matter, to help us get this bill before the House, when it will possibly take less than an hour for its consideration and passage, and get it to the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] a question. Does this report come in the nature of legislation? Is it in the form of a bill?

Mr. STANLEY. No; there will be no bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it expected the House will vote?

Mr. STANLEY. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question is just to set aside time for discussion of it?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object. I believe it is a matter of great interest to have the steel report discussed, but I am getting in about the position where, unless there is some sincere effort made here to get this bill up and secure its passage, I shall have to object to unanimous consent in the future.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] desires is to have authority on Thursday next to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for general debate upon the report of the steel investigating committee?

Mr. STANLEY. That is it.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman couples with his request not to meet at 11 o'clock, but to commence debate at 11 o'clock.

I think that would be better settled afterwards, and the question of a night session settled on Thursday night. I ask that the gentleman modify his request so as to make it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, subject to conference reports and appropriation bills.

Mr. STANLEY. I have no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not agree to that myself, Mr. Speaker, because I am perfectly willing and glad for the gentleman to have opportunity for debate. Of course, this report has gone to the calendar. There is nothing in the proposition but to have general debate, and I think it very proper that the gentleman from Kentucky and his colleagues have opportunity to discuss this matter before the committee, but if you go into committee you can not bring up these other bills if you desire to do so.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I think unless there is some time agreed upon as to the seamen's bill, I shall have to object.

Mr. STANLEY. You do not object to this, do you?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If this House can find time to discuss the reports on the steel investigation, losing many hours without final action on those reports, I think that time should be given to the consideration of one of the most important measures that has been pending in this Congress, and that is upon the Dillingham or Burnett bill, looking to the restriction of undesirable foreign immigration. Why waste the valuable time of this House in its closing hours in a useless discussion which does not mean action on the part of the House——

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOWMAN]?

Mr. AUSTIN. In a moment. And deny a day in the House for the consideration of the most important legislation to the American people that is now pending before Congress, namely, for the restriction of undesirable foreign immigration? And, unless there is some understanding in reference to a hearing and consideration of that legislation, I shall object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman think he should welcome a discussion of this steel report that will clear up some matters connected with the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., in which the people of his State may be interested?

Mr. AUSTIN. The people of this country are more vitally interested in the subject I have mentioned than they are in a lot of speeches on the subject of the steel investigation, which will be made without any action by Congress on the steel reports.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman, by indulging in rather extreme language, is endeavoring to avoid the exposition of a lot of valuable information that may not be pleasing to the gentleman's party at this particular time.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not object to a thorough investigation and airing of every Republican national administration, but every Member of this House knows the appeal that is being made daily for legislation along the lines I have suggested; and unless those in control of legislation give us a promise and an assurance of action on one of these two bills I have named, I shall object to the waste of time in this House for mere discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee request the gentlemen on the other side to fix a day when we can consider the Dillingham bill or the Burnett bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I insist upon a day being named for the consideration of the legislation I have named.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have received several hundred letters regarding this immigration question from the people in my district. Those letters have been referred to the House with the request that they should be referred to the committee having charge of this legislation. I have received this morning several letters, and this question should surely be considered by this House and some conclusion arrived at. I fully agree with the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] that this is an extremely necessary piece of legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman which side he is on. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWMAN. I will state that when we come to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. This is a good time to express yourselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. I object until we can have an understanding.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I demand the regular order. The gentleman can not have an understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] demands the regular order.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a conference report on the wool bill (H. R. 22195), and ask that the Clerk report it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will not withhold his point of order. There may be some little discussion on the conference report, and I am not going to try to force a roll call on the gentleman in the absence of a sufficient number of Members here. Possibly when we get into the discussion we shall have a quorum here.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, first I would like to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The House having set apart, by special order, one hour for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] to address the House immediately after the reading of the Journal, is it in order to call up any other matter?

The SPEAKER. Well, if it were at the beginning of the session, instead of toward the end of it——

Mr. NORRIS. This is not "toward the end of it"——

The SPEAKER (continuing). The Chair would be very much disposed to rule that where an agreement of that kind had been entered into it took precedence over conference reports and everything else. But the business of the House must be wound up some way or other.

Mr. MANN. Was it not for the House, Mr. Speaker, to consider that when it made the order?

The SPEAKER. When the House makes these special orders—if the Chair may be permitted to state the case according to his ideas—it makes them without any consideration whatever.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the House made this order in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The special order obtained by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] was passed over, as was stated in the House, until after the conference report on the wool bill should be disposed of. I understand that if we get the wool bill over to the Senate to-day it will probably be disposed of there and thus expedite adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that under the agreement that was made here half an hour ago——

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will pardon me, there was no agreement made.

The SPEAKER. If it was not an agreement, what was it?

Mr. MANN. The gentlemen proposed an agreement, but I expressly stated that I would not make any agreement.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the business of the House, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report on the wool bill be submitted and considered before proceeding with my remarks.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly patent that the wool bill could not be voted upon for some time, because Members of the House understood yesterday that the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] would make his speech this morning. I notice a considerable attendance on the Democratic side of the House and some lack of attendance on the Republican side of the House, denoting the varying degrees of interest that the two sides of the House have in the speech. I suggest that if the gentleman from Texas will go on and make his speech gentlemen on both sides will come in in time for the wool report. But no one now would want to have a roll call on the wool bill without time being allowed for gentlemen to get here. I think it shortens it for the gentleman from Texas to address the House first, and he will hold everybody who comes and attract others to come. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] does not seem to care particularly as to the time at which he speaks, and there was some kind of a loose agreement here 30 minutes ago to the effect that certain things should be attended to. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has the right of way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois make his point of order when we come to a vote on the bill. The House has about as many Members present now as is usual, and it will be after 12 o'clock when the vote will come.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to consume time on the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not expect to consume any great length of time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about it. The report came in late last evening. The gentleman from Alabama asked that the session commence this morning at 11 o'clock, and did so at a time when nearly everybody had left the Chamber. One or two gentlemen have spoken to me about debate on this bill. I do not know whether they want to talk or not. They are not here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is taking advantage of the House to have the House meet at 11 o'clock, with the understanding that one gentleman is to occupy an hour, and to then call up another matter in the House, and therefore I insist on the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it was stated in the RECORD last night that either the wool bill or the conference report on the legislative bill would be considered at 11 o'clock to-day. That was the reason I asked the House to meet at that time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it was stated that the gentleman from Texas would occupy one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following gentlemen failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. The roll call shows 204 Members present, a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to; and the Doorkeeper was directed to open the doors.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the statement in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the statement instead of the conference report on the wool bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1130).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule K thereof, being paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'SCHEDULE K. WOOL AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

"'360. On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 29 per cent ad valorem.

"'361. On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, bur waste, thread waste, garnetted waste, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and on all other wastes and on woolen rags composed wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 29 per cent ad valorem.

"'362. On combed wool or tops and roving or roping, made wholly of wool or camel's hair, or of which wool or camel's hair is the component material of chief value, and all wools and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 32 per cent ad valorem.

"'363. On yarns made wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 35 per cent ad valorem.

"'364. On cloths, knit fabrics, flannels not for underwear, composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section, webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, on any of the foregoing composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and on all manufactures of every description made by any process of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, whether containing india rubber or not, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 49 per cent ad valorem.

"'365. On all blankets, and flannels for underwear, composed wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 38 per cent ad valorem.

"'366. On Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; on Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; and on carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms, and Oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem.

"'367. On Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; and on velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

"'368. On tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise; on treble ingrain, three-ply, and all-chain Venetian carpets; on wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain carpets; on druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise; and on carpets and carpeting of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 30 per cent ad valorem.

"'369. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description.

"'370. On all manufactures of hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, or of which any of the hair mentioned in paragraph 360 form the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 49 per cent ad valorem.

"'371. Whenever in this act the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animals, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.'

"SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported and hereinbefore enumerated, described, and provided for, for which no entry has been made, and all such goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry or withdrawal thereof than the duty which would be imposed if such goods, wares, or merchandise were imported on or after that date.

"SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1913."

And the Senate agree to the same.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
D. W. SHACKLEFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.
ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the dutics on wool and manufactures of wool, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying report:

The agreement reached by the conference committee is in the form of a substitute for the House bill and the amendment of the Senate, and is set forth in extenso in the accompanying conference report.

In brief, the salient points of agreement recommended as to the differences between the two Houses on the rates of duty on wool and manufactures thereof are as follows:

The rate of duty recommended on raw wool is 29 per cent ad valorem, instead of 20 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the House bill, and the varying rates, ranging from 10 to 35 per cent ad valorem, on the three classifications of wool proposed by the Senate.

The rate on wool wastes and rags agreed upon is 29 per cent ad valorem, instead of 20 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the House bill and the rates of 25 or 30 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the Senate amendment.

The duty on combed wool or tops agreed upon is 32 per cent ad valorem, instead of 25 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the House bill and 40 per cent ad valorem as proposed by the Senate.

The duty agreed upon for yarns is 35 per cent ad valorem, instead of 30 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the House bill and 45 per cent ad valorem as proposed in the Senate amendment.

The rate of duty on blankets and flannels for underwear is fixed at 38 per cent ad valorem, instead of 30 per cent ad valorem in the House bill for blankets and the cheaper flannels.

The duty agreed upon for cloths, ready-made clothing, knit fabrics, flannels not for underwear, women's dress goods, webbings, gorings, etc., and articles not specially provided for, is 49 per cent ad valorem, instead of the varying rates in the House bill, ranging from 35 to 50 per cent ad valorem, and 55 per cent ad valorem as proposed by the Senate.

Three classifications were agreed upon for carpets, ranging in duty from 30 to 50 per cent ad valorem instead of the varying classifications in the House bill carrying duties from 25 to 50 per cent ad valorem, and 35 per cent ad valorem as proposed by the Senate amendment.

The date when the act shall take effect is made January 1, 1913.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
D. W. SHACKLEFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the statement that has just been read at the Clerk's desk indicates to the House the difference and the change of rates between the present law and the House bill and the conference report that has been agreed upon by the conferees of the two Houses. A comparison of the rates of duties on imports with the last year on the wool bill shows that the imports on raw wool under the Payne law for the year 1911 amounted to $29,572,000. The amount of estimated imports was $66,000,000 under the House bill. The estimated amount of imports under the conference bill is $60,000,000. With these imports it would show a duty on raw wool raised by the House bill of $13,389,000 and by the conference bill $17,400,000, as against $12,482,000 raised by the present law last year.

The reduction in the rate of duty on raw wool is shown by a comparison of the rate of duty of last year under the Payne bill and the House bill and the conference report to be as follows: Last year the average rate of duty on raw wool was 42.21 per cent of all raw wool imported. The House bill provided a rate of duty of 20 per cent, and the conference report bill provides a rate of duty of 29 per cent. In other words, there will be a reduction of something over 13 per cent ad valorem on raw wool if this bill becomes a law.

Now, in the manufactures of wool last year the total importation under the present law was $18,823,000. The estimated importation under the House bill was $63,000,000. The estimated importation under the conference bill would be $51,000,000.

Under that basis of importation the revenue under the Payne bill last year amounted actually on manufactures of wool to $16,499,000. The estimated revenue under the House bill would have been $27,000,000 and under the conference bill $25,000,000.

The average tax levied by the Payne bill, the present law, on manufactures of wool last year amounted to 87.65 per cent. The estimated tax on manufactures of wool, as provided by the House bill, is 42.55 per cent, and under the conference bill now presented to the House amounted to 48.36 per cent.

So that if this bill becomes a law the reduction of rates on manufactures of wool will be the difference between 87.65 per cent and 48.36 per cent, or 37.5 per cent. The year before that the average rate of duty under the Payne bill was 90 per cent.

Now, assembling the entire woolen schedule, including raw wool and manufactures of wool, the imports under the Payne bill last year were $48,395,000. The estimated amount of imports under the House bill was $130,000,000, and the estimated imports under the conference report bill is $111,890,000. The revenue derived from Schedule K last year amounted to $28,982,000, as compared with $41,904,000 for the year 1910, or a falling off in this schedule of about $30,000,000 last year over the year before. The estimated duty that would be raised by the House bill is about $40,000,000. The estimated revenue that would be raised by the conference bill is $42,000,000. The total ad valorem tax levied by the present law for the year 1911 amounted to 59.89 per cent. The estimated ad valorem rate under the House bill would be 31 per cent ad valorem, and under the conference report 37.98 per cent. In other words, the average ad valorem rate of the House bill was about 7 per cent ad valorem less than the rate proposed in the conference report.

The conference report itself is nearly 22 per cent less than the average rate by the present law.

Now, I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill becomes a law it will raise as much, if not more, revenue, and probably considerably more revenue than is raised by the present law, and yet at the same time there will be a reduction on the entire schedule of something like 22 per cent.

But as the consumer pays the tax on the manufactured product and not on the raw product the real relief to the people would be shown in the difference between the average rate on manufactured wool under the present law of 87.65 and 48.36, the estimated rate under the conference report, or a reduction to the consumer of nearly 40 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear that if we can pass a bill that will not reduce the revenue and at the same time make a reduction to the consumers of the United States of 40 per cent of the taxes that they pay on the manufactured wool, that we are accomplishing a great result for the American people. More than that, this bill itself leaves an average ad valorem rate of 48 per cent on manufactured wool. I think it is but just, though, to state that the manufacturer, having to pay the duty on the raw wool, that that should be taken into consideration when you estimate incidental protection that would grow out of a bill of this kind, and as we estimate it that when you carry the raw wool ad valorem rate into the finished product the amount that you have got to estimate to take care of the manufacturer for what he has to pay for the raw wool is about one-half the rate levied on raw wool when you are estimating in ad valorem rates, and the reason of that is that the value has increased and therefore the estimate of the ad valorem rate grows higher, and as under this bill the ad valorem rate is 29 per cent on raw wool, 15 per cent would amount to a compensatory rate to the manufacturer, and deducting 15 per cent from the 48 per cent in this bill that the manufacturer has as an incidental protection leaves an average of 33 per cent incidental protection to the manufacturer. When you consider that for years the great iron and steel industry only had about 33 per cent protection even under a Republican bill and was reduced by the Payne tariff law, it will be greatly reduced by the law that we sent to the Senate the other day, it seems to me clear that the manufacturers of this country, having an incidental protection under this bill of something over 33 per cent, have no right to complain that they will be injured, much less destroyed, by the passage of this bill.

I believe the bill is just to the manufacturer. I believe it is fair and reasonable. I believe it is demanded in the interest of the American people. I believe that this Congress should enact it into law at once. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And now that the President has had a report from the Tariff Board, I think that the American people have a right to demand of him when the Congress of the United States, which is charged with the responsibility of legislation, once more returns its bill to him for his signature. [Applause on the Demoeratic side.] Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask how much time I have consumed?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to yield——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is this bill exactly the same as the bill adopted by the conference report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a clerical change in one line of two words that are added in one line, but outside of that——

Mr. LONGWORTH. What is that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no change in rates. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has the interlineation there.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman one more question. He has been speaking about the rates on manufactured wool, and I want to ask him this question: Does the gentleman believe that the rate of 29 per cent on raw wool is a protective rate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say candidly to the gentleman from Ohio that it is very much higher, I think, than necessary for revenue purposes and that as an independent proposition I would not have agreed to it. I agreed to it as a matter of compromise in order that we may get a bill to the President.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But is it, in the gentleman's judgment, a protective rate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, if we look at it from the standpoint of protection, I do not believe that the sheep industry of this country needs any rate for protection whatever. If any rate, looking at it from a protective standpoint, would be a protective rate, the only thing to justify the levying of a tax on raw wool, in my judgment, as shown by the Tariff Board report and by my own opinion on the subject, is to levy a tax for revenue and revenue alone.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then it is, in the gentleman's opinion, a protective rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think any——

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is largely in excess of the revenue rate, is it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think that there is any rate levied on raw wool justified from the standpoint of protection as the gentleman looks at the standpoint of protection. In other words, as I take it, the position of the gentleman from Ohio on protection is that a rate should be levied that will equal the difference of cost at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to the producer. As I understand, that is his position. Now, I say to the gentleman, from my investigation I do not believe that there is any real difference in the cost in this country and abroad on the raising of raw wool, except in merino sheep in Ohio, and there is only 5,000,000 sheep in that herd, and that on all other sheep in the United States, as shown by the Tariff Board's report, there is no difference in the cost of production. I do not think we ought to levy a tax merely to protect one herd of sheep when the sheep raisers of Ohio, as far as cross-bred sheep are concerned, have shown that they can be raised without protection and a living made out of them. There is no justification in merely levying a tax to protect merino sheep when the sheep industry can survive without it, and I think the gentleman himself will agree with me that the report of the Tariff Board shows that there is no difference in cost on other flocks of sheep. Therefore, if that is the case, there is no difference in cost on anything except the merino sheep in Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. I think it is shown to the contrary conclusively, but I will not go into that now. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Does he believe the passage of this bill will reduce the price of raw wool?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not know that it will. I think that it will bring about the importation of a larger amount of raw wool. As a matter of fact, last year territorial wool in this country was selling for less than imported wool after you removed the tax. And, therefore, I am not prepared to say that it will reduce the price of raw wool, but I do say most emphatically that if you pass this bill it will reduce the price of a great many articles to the benefit of the American people.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The reason I asked the question is that I want to be perfectly clear as to the gentleman's position. It is this: That the passage of this bill would reduce manufactured wool 40 per cent but would not reduce the price of raw wool at all?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I stated to the gentleman, on last year's statement territorial wools last year vary. It might reduce it as to some years, but last year territorial wool was sold cheaper in this country than imported wool with the tariff taken off. And I can not say, under those circumstances, as compared to last year it would reduce the price. It may do this: It may prevent an exorbitant price being asked in the future, but it will undoubtedly reduce the taxes on a great many articles where the present tariff is prohibitive.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am not speaking of manufactured wool at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have answerd the gentleman's question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman one more question as to his position. If it were not for the necessities of revenue, to which he has alluded, would he favor putting wool on the free list?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it was not for the purpose of revenue, I would not lay a tax on anything. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] how much time he desires me to yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not want any more time than the gentleman has already consumed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I consumed?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I yield to the gentleman from New York 20 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] wants five minutes. That is the only request I have for time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will take pleasure in yielding the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 5 minutes, and then the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is to be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama referred to the merino sheep of Ohio as a "herd," which, of course, illustrates how much the gentleman knows about the sheep business. The man who refers to a flock of sheep as a "herd" can not be very well informed on the fundamental propositions connected with the wool industry.

Coming from a State that has nearly a tenth of all the sheep in the Union, and a larger proportion of the sheep of merino blood, I should be very glad indeed if it were possible to settle the question of the wool tariff at this time. And the flock masters whom I represent would be willing to accept any measure which would make it possible, or under which it would be possible, for them to continue in business with a reasonable assurance of a fair profit.

But this bill is objectionable not only to them, but to all who believe in American industries, including both the raising of sheep and the manufacture of wool. First, the bill is not carefully or wisely drawn. It is not scientific in its schedules. While some of its rates may be high enough, others are altogether too low; and if the average were a correct one, it is not a well-balanced bill, and would be destructive to certain very important lines of industry.

As to the rate on raw wool, not only is the ad valorem itself too low, as shown by the report of the Tariff Board, which, contrary to the views expressed by my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], shows that the average of American wool needs a protection amounting to about 35 or 36 per cent ad valorem; but, further, no ad valorem rate can properly protect the wool industry; no ad valorem rate on wool can properly protect the American Treasury. Wool is brought from the ends of the earth. It passes through oftentimes half a dozen hands before it finally reaches the customhouse. It is practically impossible for the customs officials adequately and properly and fairly to adjust and levy an ad valorem rate. The result would be inevitably undervaluations, cheating, and fraud. All honest importers would be driven out of the business, and the Treasury would be robbed at one end and the American sheep raisers would be put out of business at the other end.

Not only would the merino-wool industry in this country suffer—and nearly nine-tenths of our sheep have some merino blood in them—not only would the merino-wool industry suffer under this bill, if it were not largely destroyed, but no part of the wool industry could be prosperous under the rate proposed in the manner in which it is proposed as an ad valorem rate, because it can not be administered in a way to afford protection either to the grower of the wool or to the Treasury.

And therefore, though I should be glad to vote for a rate even somewhat lower than the rate which the report of the Tariff Board indicates would be surely protective, if that could settle the question, I can not in justice to the American industries manufacturing wool or in justice to the people who are growing wool on the farms and ranches, support this measure, which would be destructive of all these industries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this is substantially the same wool bill that was sent to the President before, and which encountered his veto—not simply because of the report of the Tariff Board, because we did not have it at that time, but also because of the information then at hand that showed it was not a protective measure.

Since that time we have had the report of the Tariff Board, and the mind of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is in the same state of confusion on this subject as it was in then. He was then for a revenue duty of 20 per cent, because the Treasury needed it, although at heart he was for free wool. Then, we had the Senate action upon the question, with the same old duty of 35 per cent on wool as now. The majority behind this bill in the Senate seems to have learned nothing from the Tariff Board's report. Then they go into conference, and it is not 20 per cent or 35 per cent as the result, but 29 per cent, and I suppose that all three rates are according to the opinion of all these gentlemen, in accordance with the findings of the Tariff Board.

Now, no intelligent gentleman can read carefully and study the report of the Tariff Board without coming to the conclusion that the necessary lowest protection on wool needed is over 35 per cent. With an ad valorem it ought to be more, because of the undervaluations and the cheating of the duty. They do not seem to have considered at all the recommendations of this board for a specific duty on the scoured content of the wool, which all experts agree is the only scientific way of levying a duty upon wool, instead of resorting to the 29 per cent ad valorem duty; and now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], toward the close of his remarks, is trying to persuade himself that he is protecting the wool and woolen industry.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. I never assumed to protect anybody. I simply stated what the incidental protection was.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman says that the duty he provides—29 per cent on wool—is more protection than the wool needs; that it does not need any. If that is not protecting the wool industry, according to that statement, I would like to know what the word "protection" means.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York how he can levy any duties without incidental protection.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, if you put the duty below the difference in cost, it is not protection. Now, in reference to manufactures, he figured that there was a duty of 33 per cent over and above the compensation for the wool duty, and he said that that was more than the difference in cost, and hence was a protection to the wool manufacturing industry. Why is the gentleman making that argument? What is the meaning of this whole performance from beginning to end? Does any gentleman who is for this bill honestly desire that the duties be lowered by legislation, or are we simply still playing politics in sending a bill to the President which we feel sure the President will not sign? Is there some more of this "putting the President in a hole" which did not succeed in the first attempt, and which will not succeed now any better than it did the first time? [Applause on the Republican side.] Because now we have the report of the Tariff Board, which shows that there should be a duty of more than 35 per cent to make up the difference in the cost of the wool generally entering into the market, generally raised both here and in competing countries, the bulk of it.

Now, after allowing proper compensation for the duty on wool, the value of the wool being about about 65 per cent of the cloth, as is calculated by experts, it leaves a margin of less than 30 per cent duty on woolen cloths for the protection of the conversion of the wool into cloth, knit goods, flannels, and all manufactures of cloth in this country over and above the cost in foreign countries. The duty was 40 to 50 per cent in the Wilson bill, because then we had free wool. It was 40 per cent on cloths costing not over 50 cents a pound and 50 per cent on the higher-priced cloth. But what happened under the Wilson bill? I do not care anything about the theories of the gentleman or the theories of any other gentleman. Did or did not nearly every woolen mill and knitting mill in the country close under the Wilson bill? Did or did not the slaughter of the sheep commence and continue during the life of the Wilson bill, and did it stop only when we had the Dingley bill enacted? If there was sufficient protection, why the slaughter of the sheep? If there was sufficient protection on manufactures, why the closing of the mills?

They impudently send this bill to the President, and tell him what? Why, that it is all the protection that is needed under this report of the Tariff Board, when he knows, and the Tariff Board knows, and experts know that it is not protection either to the wool industry or to the manufacturing business. If this is sufficient protection, why does the gentleman calculate that instead of $48,000,000 of imports under the woolen schedule there will be $111,000,000? I think those were his figures as I caught them. Why this increase in imports if there is to be protection under this bill?

And then the gentleman draws on his fancy again, and his interest is for the dear consumer, and he will not stop playing politics even for six months, his interest in the dear consumer is so great; and he says it is not only on the goods that are imported but it is on the goods made here that the consumer has to pay these duties under the present law, which duties we acknowledge are greater than they should be. Yet if there is anything more clearly demonstrated than another in the Tariff Board report, it is that this duty is not added to the price, that the competition on domestic cloths is so great in manufacturing that they are sold in the market at a price much below the cost of imported articles of the same kind with the duty added. The consumer is not paying the duty in that respect. It is one of the things that is so clearly demonstrated in this Tariff Board report that the wayfaring man, though a Representative in Congress, need not err therein.

Now, why do you send this to the President? Do you gentlemen expect he is going to sign it? Not a mother's son of you expects anything of the kind. You know the bill does not give the protection which the report of the Tariff Board shows to be absolutely necessary to make up the difference in cost between this country and the cost abroad. You know that it does not make up that difference. You know that the President of the United States believes, not in overprotection, not in excessive protection, but in protection that makes up the difference in cost. Do you expect him to stultify himself?

Why, gentlemen, you can not keep up this masquerade. You can not fool the people into the idea that no matter how you cut down tariff duties, and cut out an industry by cutting down the duties, you are doing what they want. The majority of the people of this country believe in protection to American industries under tariff laws. The majority of them do not believe in excessive protection, but they believe in that protection which makes up the difference between the cost here and abroad, and you may go on sending your bills to the President, as though you had learned nothing from that wonderful work of the Tariff

Board. You call them compromise measures. Compromise for what purpose? To get something to the President that you believe he will veto. Why do you not take a bill that comes up to the requirements of the report of the Tariff Board? Why do you not take the minority House bill, if you please, and criticize it, and if you can find any flaws in it, correct them, and send that bill to the President, and see whether he will sign or veto it?

I want to say to you gentlemen, if you sent that bill to the President, there would not be any doubt about a radical reduction on the wool schedule during this session of Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman's point of view, of course, is different from that of gentlemen on this side of the House; but the minority to-day on that side of the House were the majority in the last Congress, and the bill that the present minority and the then majority passed was vetoed by the American people. We prefer a veto at the White House rather than a veto by the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is not a man within the sound of my voice that does not know that we labored to make a better bill than the present law, and still the present law is a better law than has been written on the statute books of this country within the last 50 years with reference to the tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.] I did not get all that I wanted; I was not able to revise this woolen schedule; the time was too short, the information was not sufficient. If we had had the report of the Tariff Board back of us the woolen schedule would have been revised, and in accordance with the ideas of some of the wise politicians who sit on the other side of this Chamber, such a revision of that schedule at that time in connection with the present tariff law would have given us a majority on this side of the Chamber in 1910 instead of a majority on that side.

O gentlemen, do something besides shed crocodile tears for the consumers of this country. Do something besides playing politics. You pretend to be enthusiastically triumphant now about the next election. Why in the world are you all the time neglecting the dear people, with whom you sympathize on these wool duties, to play petty politics, to put the President, nominated for reelection, in a hole, as you say? Why do you not pass that bill which the minority presented, which is a radical reduction in these rates, and still so adjusted as to cover the difference between the cost here and the cost abroad, and send that to the President, and see whether he will sign or veto that bill? If he signs it, it will give the people the relief which you say you are so anxious to give them. Gentlemen, why not revise the woolen schedule so that it will become a law and not revise it simply for election day? Possibly there may be a little boomerang about this joker of yours that you are trying to play for the second time. It did not amount to much when you tried it first, and it will amount to less now.

I am for the relief of these dear people you talk about so much, and I would like to pass the minority bill in this House, which would not only give the people relief but enable the farmers in the Western States to keep on raising sheep. It would enable our mills to run and the prosperity under the present law to be continued. True, if you do not amend the present law, that law is doing well by the people; it is not closing the mills; it is not making farming unprofitable; it does not include free trade on all farm products raised in the North, free trade on all farm products except rice. The farmers are doing well. The factories are doing well. People are at work, and men are agonizing to get people to work in the fields and in certain localities to get people to work in the factories. Perhaps you are doing the best thing to let well enough alone when it is so much better than anything you propose by any of the bills you have brought in here. Keep on playing to the galleries, and by and by, not in the dim and distant future, but in the near by and by, the galleries will be looking down on a majority in this House who are the true friends and not the false friends, like yourselves, of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I will take advantage of the leave given me to print to add to the foregoing remarks. After they had been delivered it was stated in the House that the average rate of duties under the Wilson law was 40 per cent ad valorem, which, it was stated, is higher than the bill which I offer as a substitute. Of course the latter is nothing but a guess, as you can not get a correct average under any bill except by actual results, and the bill has not yet become a law.

Aside from all this, conditions have changed in the last 18 years, and on both sides of the Atlantic they use more effective machinery and employ more efficient operatives, and the difference in cost of production is less, generally, now than it was 18 years ago.

The bill I offer is based upon a careful study of the Tariff Board report, and I confidently believe is as nearly correct as it can be made. Like the present law, if this bill is enacted it will close no mill and injure no farm. That mills were closed and sheep by the millions were slaughtered under the Wilson law is a matter of history; that the slaughter was stopped and the mills were opened was a result of the Dingley law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, at the special session last year I voted for this conference bill. I propose to vote for it again to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I shall do so, Mr. Speaker, with less hesitation than I did then, for since then we have the report of the Tariff Board. I want to frankly say that I wish the rates in this bill were somewhat higher. I believe that as to some of them they ought to be higher to be clearly beyond the danger point; but, Mr. Speaker, as between the present schedule, the present outrageous schedule of the Payne-Aldrich law and this schedule, I prefer this one. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So far as raw wool is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is demonstrated now that the purported protection of the woolgrower in the Payne-Aldrich bill is a fraud upon him, that he does not in fact get more than 50 per cent of the purported protection afforded by that bill. The fact is that this 29 per cent given in this bill, while I would like to see it higher, is actually more than the great majority of the woolgrowers have been getting during the past two years under the Payne-Aldrich law. Now, so far as the manufactures of wool are concerned, so far as the interest of the manufacturer is concerned, it may be that some of the rates in this bill are such that his profits are not going to be so great as what, under ordinary circumstances, would be reasonable.

But, Mr. Speaker, if that be so, it is his own fault, for previous tariff bills have been written by him and for him enabling him to secure exorbitant profits at the expense of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, let me say further, the Committee on Rules during this session of Congress had an investigation of the Lawrence strike. We made a very thorough investigation of the wages paid in some of the great woolen mills of the country, and found the wages paid in those woolen mills, the highest protected industry in the United States to-day, were such as ought not to exist anywhere in this great American Republic of ours, and if those wages can not be increased, then, I say, we would better get along without woolen mills in this country. I believe in American standards of living, and I believe in a reasonable wage to American laboring people, and if we can not, without taxing the American people millions of dollars a year, do that in our woolen mills, then we had better let those people stay across the water and make the things there and get them cheaper here.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is not so. They can and ought to pay higher wages. The trouble has been that these woolen manufacturers have been getting exorbitant profits and not passing on the protective duties to the laborers. They must be made to understand that if they are to get protection at the hands of the American people, which the Republican Party has always afforded, in order that they shall be able to pay American wages to American laboring men, then they must pass the benefits on to the laboring man.

My friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said that this bill is not carefully drawn; that it is not scientifically drawn, but, Mr. Speaker, the present schedule of the Payne-Aldrich law was too carefully drawn in the interest of the woolen manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While this bill may not be and is not as scientifically drawn as I would like to see it, I prefer this bill to the present law, for it does afford protection to a reasonable degree to the American manufacturer and the American woolgrower, and at the same time does afford relief to the people who use woolen goods. I prefer that rather than to maintain the present schedule of the present Payne law, which the President himself has pronounced as indefensible. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] in his statement about the bill made a very remarkable statement. He said that the rates under the Wilson bill ruined the country. The rates under the Wilson bill were 40 per cent ad valorem. The gentleman now proposes to save the country by advocating the passage of a bill in which he says the average rate is only 35 per cent. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this debate, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a statement of the amount of rates of duty charged under the woolen schedule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Table showing rates collected under the Payne law for the year ending June 30, 1911 (the last full report), as shown by the Bureau of Statistics.

	Per cent.
Class 1 wool, unwashed	43 to 46
Class 1 wool, washed	60 to 97
Class 2 wool	49 to 120
Class 3 wool	30 to 105
Wool and hair advanced	74 to 178
Yarns	76 to 149
Blankets	55 to 168
Carpets	50 to 72
Cloths	63 to 149
Women and children's dress goods	94 to 157
Flannels	71 to 121
Knit fabrics	95 to 153
Plushes	99 to 122
Wearing apparel	65 to 92
All other manufactures of wool	61 to 157

In this table are given the minimum and maximum ad valorem rates for the year 1911 as reported in the volume named.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Tariff Board did not think it was necessary to advise the House in its report in reference to blankets and flannels, and I will ask to have read from the desk a statement of the taxes levied on blankets and flannels under the present law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rates taken from "Imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States and duties collected thereon for 1911," issued by the Bureau of Statistics.

Blankets costing 47 cents a pound paid 105 per cent; blankets more than 3 yards in length, costing 28 cents a pound, paid 168.54 per cent; valued at 59 cents a pound, 124.94 per cent; valued at 93 cents a pound, 102.54 per cent. Cloth valued at 33 cents a pound paid 149.59 per cent; valued at 60 cents a pound, paid 123.71 per cent; valued at $1.12 a pound, 94.17 per cent; valued at $1.77 a pound, 63.92 per cent; the dearer the cloth the less the rate. Women's and children's dress goods, weighing 4 ounces or less to square yard, costing from 13 cents to 14 cents per square yard, 103 per cent; weighing more than 4 ounces to square yard, costing 38 cents per square yard, 130.68 per cent; costing 61 cents a yard, 116.07 per cent; composed wholly or in part of wool, costing 31 cents a yard, 157.69 per cent; costing 58 cents a yard, 125.82 per cent.

Flannels costing 46 cents per pound, 108 per cent; weighing over 4 ounces to square yard, costing 61 cents per pound, 121.93 per cent; costing 85 cents per pound, 107.08 per cent; knit fabrics costing 32 cents per pound, 153.19 per cent; costing 64 cents per pound, 118.62 per cent; costing $1.10 per pound, 95.09 per cent; plushes costing 60 cents per pound, 122.30 per cent; costing 98 cents per pound, 99.95 per cent; other manufactures, wholly or in part of wool, 157 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that I desire to ask him a question. The table which has just been read is what? What does the gentleman pretend that to be?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is a selection of the rates of duty from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics showing the enormous rates that are levied on some products under the Payne law.

Mr. PAYNE. Was somebody experimenting on importing four or five dollars' worth?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. There are those instances in the book, and only those.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are instances of how prohibitive the rates are when there are only a few imported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 62, answered "present" 5, not voting 162, as follows:

Mr. BURGESS with Mr. WEEKS.
Mr. FORNES with Mr. BRADLEY.
Mr. BARTLETT with Mr. BUTLER.
Mr. HOBSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. HILL, voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. PALMER. Then I desire to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. PALMER was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, may I withdraw my vote? I am paired with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I am making my daily statement.

The SPEAKER. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. BUTLER. I voted "no."

The SPEAKER. Call the gentleman's name.

The name of Mr. BUTLER was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. LEVY. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. LEVY. I had just reached the door when the roll was concluded.

The SPEAKER. It makes no difference; if the gentleman was not in the Hall, he can not vote.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to have voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make an explanation about his not voting.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall exceed the hour, but I would like to proceed without feeling that I am under restraint as to time. I shall not trespass upon the time of the House, and I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to complete my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent to be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think many minutes over the hour.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, in closing his spectacular remarks, said:

> Mr. Chairman, I shall not go much further into the record of this anti-Jefferson, antiforeign, antilabor, antisoldier, and pro-Chinese candidate for the Presidency.

This statement is not in keeping with the facts and is a cunning effort to present false issues to the American voters. The gentleman should have known, or could have known with the slightest investigation, that his charges are absolutely unwarranted. The plain truth is Gov. Wilson is not against foreign immigration, labor, and the soldiers of our country, and is not an advocate of Chinese immigration. The gentleman knows this, and if he desired to be candid with the country would correctly state the truth of current politics. I here deny and challenge his statements. Gov. Wilson stands before the country as the Democratic nominee in courageous attitude, with nothing to conceal, with no apologies to make, and as the one candidate aspiring to the Presidency unfettered, independent, clean in politics, able, faithful, and with an incomparable record of public service. In this contest the chance remarks of any candidate made or written in the past will count for naught.

What the candidate and his party stand for, with the ability and intention to faithfully perform pledges and platform promises, will be the supreme test. And from that standpoint we present our candidate, with a brilliant record of official achievement as executive of his State, with every promise literally and faithfully redeemed, in contrast with Taft and Roosevelt, whose records are shattered, with pledges and platform promises unredeemed, with faithless words of hope to the people long since forgotten by both of them. We enter the fray with eagerness and go to the people with the pledge that our candidate stands for the things that will bring relief to the overburdened masses and will keep his party's plighted word, as he has kept it in the past, and challenge its comparison with the historic fact that Mr. Taft won the votes of the people with his pledges and his party platform, and after the election turned his back upon those who had lifted him into his high office and utterly failed in his performances, as was done by Mr. Roosevelt, the candidate of George W. Perkins, E. H. Gary, and the Steel Trust, the greatest financial organization in the world's history. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We gladly join issue and enter the lists with the Republican candidates and the cause they typify; and Democracy's candidate will not be found apologetic, timid, and shirking the issue, but brave and able and honest in the people's struggle.

RODENBERG ON "PRACTICAL POLITICS."

RODENBERG says:

> In this enlightened day and age, when the standard of general intelligence is higher than it has ever been, the personality of the candidate becomes in a very large measure the platform of his party. The people are more vitally interested in ascertaining the honest convictions of the candidate, formed in a time of sober and mature reflection, uninfluenced by ambition or hope of political preferment, than they are in any professions or promises contained in a platform which they know has been constructed to meet the exigencies of practical politics.

This quotation from the gentleman's speech indicates the quality of his politics. It places him in the class of "practical politicians," where he aspires to be numbered.

Again, it thoroughly explains and establishes another thing, perhaps not intended by him, to wit, why the Republican Party and Mr. Taft, in 1908, at Chicago promised specific things to the American people in their platform and then, after deceiving them as to "tariff revision" and certain other things, deliberately and faithlessly repudiated their solemn pledges and raised the tariff burdens, because, as RODENBERG says, "professions or promises contained in a platform" must "be constructed to meet the exigencies of practical politics." Hence, that Chicago platform was made to deceive the people, and, according to the gentleman from Illinois, Taft was the real platform and embodiment of his party's intentions and only nominated for the purpose of repudiating such platform, as he did on the tariff and other issues after he was elected, and through his real self serve the special interests regardless of party pledges. The gentleman from Illinois calls that "practical politics." He wishes to be so classified, and I promptly accord him the coveted honor. According to his standard, the platform is only made to delude, and the candidate, as a "practical politician," must conceal his real views and convictions till the ballots are cast and then trample his party's pledges into the dirt as meaningless, in accordance with Mr. Taft's well-known record.

WILSON ON THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The gentleman quotes a brief extract from two of Gov. Wilson's books—the History of the American People and The Life of George Washington. They read:

The difference between Mr. Jefferson and Gen. Jackson was not a difference of moral quality so much as a difference in social stock and breeding. Mr. Jefferson, an aristocrat, and yet a philosophical radical, deliberately practiced the arts of the politician and exhibited oftentimes the sort of insincerity which subtle natures yield to without loss of essential integrity.

* * * * * * *

Washington found him a guide who needed watching.

Read those extracts in regard to every quotation made and the gentleman frequently confuses and misinterprets their real meaning. Gov. Wilson has not written a thing in any book for which he should apologize before the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The true answer to this effort to prejudice the public mind against Gov. Wilson is that such tactics are puerile. Because if the great Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, could return to this earth to-day he would be found following the flag of Woodrow Wilson in this contest, just as we find that illustrious living Democrat, William J. Bryan, giving adherence to the Democratic nominee against the party of unredeemed and broken promises [applause on the Democratic side], members of which are now lost in confusion trying to follow Taft and Roosevelt, both of whom have given and would give aid and comfort to the special privileged classes and interests seeking favors at the hands of the Government.

The "cocked-hat" letter brought Bryan and Wilson together, and so would Wilson's fight against the greed of trusts, special privilege, and avarice unite Jefferson and Wilson in this fight for the people, could the Sage of Monticello be permitted to return to the scenes of earthly action.

WILSON ON FOREIGN IMMIGRATION.

Again, the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to prejudice the minds of this House and the country against Wilson in regard to foreigners and foreign immigration. He totally misinterprets the distinguished governor on that subject. He understands full well that Gov. Wilson is not opposed to worthy foreigners of every clime in the universe coming to our country as the abode of liberty to make this Republic their home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us analyze the language. And I intend to set it out in the RECORD so that the American people may scrutinize it:

Now, there came multitudes of men of the lowest class from the south of Italy and men of the meaner sort out of Hungary and Poland, men out of the ranks where there was neither skill nor energy nor any initiative of quick intelligence; and they came in numbers which increased from year to year, as if the countries of the south of Europe were disburdening themselves of the more sordid and hapless elements of their population. The people of the Pacific coast had clamored these many years against the admission of immigrants out of China, and in May, 1892, got at last what they wanted—a Federal statute which practically excluded from the United States all Chinese who had not already acquired the right of residence; and yet the Chinese were more to be desired, as workmen if not as citizens, than most of the coarse crew that came crowding in every year at the eastern ports.

Consider the meaning of the expression, "men of the meaner sort." What did Wilson mean when he said, "More to be desired as workmen"? By whom "desired"? Wilson does not say by himself. I answer RODENBERG with his own words, expressed immediately following his quotation and comment thereon. In the same speech in which he arraigns Wilson he says:

While I believe in the strict enforcement of our immigration laws, to protect us against the vicious, the lawless, and the depraved, yet I would not draw the line against admitting immigrants who, judged by our own experience, possess the possibility of developing into useful American citizenship.

He, too, charges that there are the "vicious," the "depraved," the "lawless" in foreign countries. Does he wish them for American citizens? Does any right-thinking man of any nationality desire such immigration? The mere propounding of the query answers the point with every patriotic voter. Are not the views of Wilson and RODENBERG identical on immigration? He, too, would exclude the "vicious," the "lawless," and the "depraved." Are they not the "meaner sort" to which Gov. Wilson referred?

I challenge and defy the gentleman to point to a single instance where Wilson ever in his history or elsewhere said one word against the worthy immigrants from Italy, Poland, or Hungary, the homes of Garibaldi, Kosciuszko, and Kossuth.

Again let Wilson speak for himself. In refuting these false interpretations and charges, he wrote a letter to N. O. Piotrowski, Esq., of Chicago. The gentleman can not arouse the prejudice of the foreigners against Gov. Wilson by such claptrap argument. The letter is well worth perusal by every liberty-loving American citizen and every man throughout the country who loves freedom and good government:

[Personal.]

MARCH 13, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. PIOTROWSKI: I remember with pleasure meeting you when I was in Chicago, and esteem it a privilege to reply to your frank and interesting letter of March 11.

My history was written on so condensed a scale that I am only too well aware that passages such as you quote are open to misconstruction, though I think their meaning is plain when they are fairly scrutinized. No one who knows anything of the history of Europe can fail to be familiar with the distinguished history of the Polish people, and any writer who spoke without discrimination of members of that nation as constituting an undesirable element in population would not only be doing a gross injustice but exhibiting a great ignorance. I did not know all of the facts you so interestingly set forth in your letter, but I did know, in a general way, of the honorable and useful careers of the Polish citizens of America and the self-respect and steady achievement of the Polish communities which have been established in various parts of the country. In the passage quoted from my history I was speaking of a particular time when it had become the practice of certain employers on this side of the water to import large numbers of unskilled laborers under contract for the purpose of displacing American labor, for which they would have been obliged to pay more.

Here permit me to give the instances. The American Woolen Co. imported foreigners from every part of the earth to Lawrence, Mass., and paid children in their factories two and three dollars a week and adults six and seven dollars a week. This great protected industry allowed the children to pay five and ten cents a week for water, and saw them crying for bread and shivering for clothing around their very factory doors. And still the Republican Party must protect the Woolen Trust.

They were drawing, in many cases, upon a class of people who would not have come of their own motion and who were not truly representative of the finer elements of the countries from which they came.

* * * * * * *

I know that a just and thoughtful man like yourself will pay no attention to the miscellaneous misinterpretations which have been put upon the passage referred to, and that you will have already interpreted my meaning as I have here endeavored to interpret it.

Your letter has very graciously afforded me an opportunity to make this explanation.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. N. O. PIOTROWSKI,
City Attorney, 59 Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And as late as July 22, 1912, at Seagirt, N. J., Gov. Wilson, in a signed statement, gave his views on foreigners and foreign immigration to Mr. Geza Kende, the able editor of the Hungarian paper, Amerikai Magyar Nepszava, of New York:

"I believe in the reasonable restriction of immigration, but not in any restriction which will exclude from the country honest, industrious men who are seeking what America has always offered, an asylum for those who seek a free field. The whole question is a very difficult one, but I think can be solved with justice and generosity. Anyone who has the least knowledge of Hungarian history must feel that stock to have proved itself fit for liberty and opportunity.

* * * * * * *

"I never have had any objection to sound immigration from any country," he said, and being asked just how he defined "sound immigration," he said he referred to the coming of honest men and women from other lands whose presence in the United States is not calculated to interfere with the health and moral conditions of this country.

It is a wholly false insinuation to say that ever Wilson for a single day of his life opposed the right kind of immigration to our country. Never did he breathe or write such opposition anywhere.

The gentleman will fail in his efforts to prejudice the voter. His party must meet the real issue. For more than a generation the American people have been moving up to this great conflict, and the battle is on. Democracy asks no quarter at the hands of the opposition. We know that Wilson carries the flag typifying the rights of the people and are confident of victory in November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us examine how this charge, oft repeated, has affected the foreigners in our country. Here is what they say through their papers. As a matter of fact, the mendacious use of these quotations when the situation is once explained, has failed to deceive the people most intimately concerned. Foremost in repudiating these attacks are the Italians and Poles themselves. The leading newspapers in representing the nationalities are placing Gov. Wilson in a proper light. The editor of La Voce del Popolo, the national Italian newspaper in New York, after writing to Gov. Wilson and receiving an explanation, has come to his support.

All Italians can be satisfied—with Gov. Wilson's frank and clear explanation. Gov. Wilson has now made it entirely plain, and a man who has no political or party ends to serve gladly acknowledges it. We have had the greatest esteem for Woodrow Wilson ever since he became governor of New Jersey and undertook to eliminate corruption, and we entertain toward him to-day the same deep and disinterested admiration.

Says this paper—

So we have here an explanation of the feeling with which that quotation has been received by the so-called foreigner. Let me for a moment refer to the record of gentlemen on that side of the aisle in regard to the labor question, the Chinese issue. The gentleman from Illinois undertook to place Gov. Wilson in the attitude of being a pro-Chinese advocate, and his party with having opposed the immigration of the Chinese to this country.

He is indeed ignorant of history, or else seems to be ready to suppress some of the facts. Why, do you know that back in the early eighties, when the American laborer was endeavoring to secure action excluding the Chinese from this country, the Democratic Party was advocating that legislation and the Republican Party, almost in solid phalanx, stood on that side of the aisle favoring the Chinese? [Applause on the Democratic side.] The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows that two Congresses passed bills to exclude the Chinese from the Pacific shores and other ports of our country, and two Republican Presidents vetoed these Chinese-exclusion acts. It was a Democratic House that passed a Chinese-exclusion act in 1892. Back in those days two Republican Presidents stood by the Chinese and against the American laborer. Presidents Arthur and Hayes vetoed these Chinese-exclusion bills, and when they came back to Congress the Democrats, almost in solid fashion, voted to pass the bills over the vetoes of these Republican Presidents, and nearly every Republican voted in favor of the Chinese coming here in competition with American labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On January 28, 1879, Hayes sent his veto message to Congress; and on March 1, 1879, 83 Democrats could only secure the pitiful number of 22 Republican Members to vote with them to pass the bill over the veto, while 81 Republicans voted "nay," and the veto prevailed. I am sure RODENBERG's face will blush with shame when he reads that vote of his party.

Then, in 1882, another bill excluding the Chinese laborers was passed by Democrats; and on March 9, 1882, Arthur vetoed that. And in the Senate 31 Democrats voted to pass the bill over his veto, and could not secure a single Republican Senator to vote with them, while 28 voted with the Chinamen and against the bill. And when the bill came up in the House on April 17, 1882, 103 Democrats voted to pass it over the President's veto, and few Republicans dared to defy the protective-tariff lords and vote with the Democrats.

And now, Mr. RODENBERG, when you talk about your party opposing Chinese laborers, I can only cry "Shame!" And yet the gentleman from Illinois says that his party defended the American laborer. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party ought not to take the flattering unction to its soul that it did anything for the American laborer. For 14 years I have sat on this floor and have seen Republican Speakers occupying that chair refuse to allow legislation favorable to labor to come before this House.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] during his incumbency as Speaker of the House, whenever the labor people came to him and asked for legislation to prevent government by injunction, remedies limiting the power of Federal judges in the issuance of injunctions, touching trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt, and kindred measures, scoffed at their demand and turned them away from the door of the Speaker's room. Year after year we have heard them appeal for legislation, and not until the Democratic Party came into power two years ago was their cry heeded. This very Congress has passed a bill limiting the power of Federal injunctions, the power of petty judicial tyrants. Such enactment will prohibit them from governing people through the writ of injunction. When we brought the bill to the floor of the House for consideration, the Republican Party that had sat here for all these years stifling legislation became afraid and did not have courage to vote against the relief demanded by labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When we brought up the measure providing for jury trial in cases of indirect contempt, a splendid measure which is now pending at the other end of the Capitol, Democrats supported and pressed it. When a division was demanded, the Republicans, who for 15 years had suppressed this legislation, did not have the courage to again suppress it, but ran to cover and voted with the Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is idle to boast of the Republican Party being the friend of labor and Wilson being inimicable to their interests. We are glad to welcome the issue, and when we have finished this contest it will be ascertained that we are standing by the people, and the Republican Party is still consistently fighting the battle of the special interests, as they have always done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that the standpat Republican from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who loved the former Speaker of this House [Mr. CANNON] so well that he characterized him as the "Iron Duke of the Republican Party," should assail the candidate of the Democratic Pafty. There could be no more fitting representative to make this assault on Democracy's nominee than the distinguished gentleman from the East St. Louis district, whose record is so graphically portrayed in the magazine of Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE. The recital of the record is commended to the consideration of all those who wish to read an interesting congressional biography of the gentleman now assailing Democracy's nominee.

GOV. WILSON'S NEW JERSEY RECORD.

Permit me here to proceed with the consideration of Wilson's magnificent record as governor of New Jersey. That State for more than 15 years had been under the control of the Republican Party. If there was a boss-ridden State in the Union it was the State of New Jersey, and the man who is now the standard bearer of the Democratic Party converted a great Republican State completely dominated by the special interests into a Democratic State of 50,000 majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He made promises to the people and redeemed every one to the letter. The test is not what may be taken from one or two sentences in a book, but where does this man stand and what has he accomplished and is he honest? In less than six months he accomplished more for the people than had been done in that State for 20 years.

There were four laws put on the statute book of New Jersey that should alone commend Gov. Wilson not only to the people of his own State but to the voters of the entire country. The people, as I say, were under the domination of the bosses in New Jersey and could not control their own elections. Gov. Wilson demanded a direct-primary law in which the bosses could be eliminated and every voter could walk up to the polls and express his choice. Permit me to recite to you some of the provisions of that law, in order that you may see how well he kept his word.

NEW JERSEY ELECTION LAW.

The election law provides:

Direct primaries.—The people, not the self-constituted bosses, name the candidates openly at a regularly conducted, legally constituted election, not privately in a corner.

The Geran election law insures against repeating. A voter in a municipality of over 5,000 must register personally and sign his name to the registration book. When he comes to cast his ballot he must again sign the poll book. If a voter attempts to vote on another's name he must forge the signature. Forgery means imprisonment if detected, and there is the signature on the registration book as a check.

The election law chooses election officers from a list of candidates who have passed a civil-service examination. These men know the law and their duties under it. They are also familiar with the penalties for any violation of the law. Under its provisions the people have taken their government into their own hands. [Applause.]

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND WORKINGMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

Next we will consider the employers' liability and workingmen's compensation act. It is the crowning act of justice to employees.

This law prescribes the liability of an employer to make compensation for injuries received by an employee in the course of employment. It establishes an elective schedule of compensation and regulates the procedure for determining the liability and compensation of each party. It provides that an employee who is injured need not sue to obtain damages. A regular schedule covering the different classes of injuries is drawn up and the employer's liability is set opposite each. It is fair and just to those employed, because in case of accident it secures to them without delay a fixed income at a time when it is most needed. It avoids a long-drawn-out litigation, with its attendant expense, delay, and suffering. It abolishes the barbaric doctrines of assumed risk, the negligence of fellow servants, and contributory negligence. [Applause.] Let laboring men consider that measure, which has taken them from under the iron heel of corporations and placed them where they may speedily get their rights when injury occurs, and where their families may be compensated in case of death. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Pursuing his four great measures, let us next analyze

THE CORRUPT-PRACTICES ACT.

This law provides for a committee to receive and expend campaign funds. It directs that this committee make an itemized statement showing every receipt and expenditure, together with the sources from which the money came, which shall be filed as a public document and shall be open to inspection by any citizen. Each candidate must file a sworn statement of his personal contributions to the campaign committee, and this statement must show the names of any persons who paid, loaned, contributed, or otherwise furnished any moneys to said candidate in aid of his election or nomination. If any candidate does not file such statement within the period required by law he forfeits the office to which he was elected.

The law prohibits the use of money to secure election to office in excess of these clearly specified amounts:

A candidate for governor may spend	$2,500
A candidate for Congress may spend	1,500
A candidate for any county office	500
A candidate for State senate	500
A candidate for general assembly	250
A candidate for any municipal office	250

These sums can not be spent by the candidates personally, but must be disbursed by the legally appointed campaign committee. This provision can not be evaded by spending larger sums through relatives, corporate associates, or friends. The law construes all such contributions as part of the candidate's personal contribution. The law prohibits corporations from contributing to the campaign fund of any candidate or any political party. It prohibits colonizing, betting on the result of the election, intimidating voters by threat or otherwise; printing political expressions on pay envelopes, posting political handbills on factories by individuals or corporations.

And the Democratic Party has passed through the House a bill providing for publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures before nomination as well as afterwards, and it was passed by almost a unanimous vote. If it ever gets out of the other end of the Capitol and gets up Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House, we may know something about the sources of funds of the candidates for President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As one of Gov. Wilson's great achievements will stand out the act reviving and placing teeth in the obsolete New Jersey commission law in the enactment known as the—

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

The public utilities board is given general supervision of, and control over, all public utilities, and also their property, property rights, equipment, facilities, and franchises, so far as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act. The term "public utility" is legally defined to include every individual, copartnership, association, corporation, or joint-stock company, their lessees, trustees, or receivers appointed by any court whatsoever, that now or hereafter may own, operate, manage, or control, within the State of New Jersey, any steam railroad, street railway, traction railway, canal, express, subway, pipe line, gas, electric light, heat, power, water, oil, sewer, telephone, telegraph system, plant, or equipment for public use, under privileges granted or hereafter to be granted by the State of New Jersey or by any political subdivision thereof.

This board has power, either upon its own initiative or upon complaint in writing, to investigate any matter concerning any public utility as herein defined. It can appraise and value property. It can fix rates, test appliances, fix junction points and connections, fix rates of depreciation, prohibit unjust discrimination, regulate extensions of indebtedness and capitalization of franchises, and it must approve all sales, leases, or mortgages and all transfers of stock to other companies. All franchises or grants by municipalities come under its jurisdiction.

POWERS OF THE BOARD.

The board can compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of records. No witness may escape testifying on the ground of incrimination, and no immunity can inure to any witness on account of his testimony.

All orders of the board to continue service or rates in effect at the time said order is made shall be immediately operative; all other orders shall become effective upon the date specified therein, which shall be at least 20 days after the date of said order.

Violations of the provisions of the law subject every officer who participates to personal punishment for misdemeanor, and every public-service corporation must file a sworn analysis of its methods of doing business, so that the officers responsible may in every case be identified. In default of compliance with any order of the board, when the same shall become effective the person or public untility affected thereby shall be subject to a penalty of $100 per day for every day during which such default continues to be recovered in an action of debt in the name of the State. No finer law for regulating public-service corporations can be found in any State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Since the gentleman from Illinois has deliberately assailed Gov. Wilson with a spirit akin to malevolence, and charged that he is not a friend of labor, let me set out more at length for the sake of truthful history and the benefit of honest voters his exact record touching labor measures. Here it is. The following labor laws were passed under his administration:

Fire-escape law, amending factory laws, and placing New Jersey in the vanguard of States in the protection of workers in factories and workshops.

Regulating employment agencies and licensing the same.

Making the improper influencing of labor representatives or foremen a misdemeanor.

Employers' liability and compensation act.

Prohibiting the employment of children in mercantile establishments during school hours; providing for a 58-hour week; and prohibiting children under 16 years to work between the hours of 7 p. m. and 7 a. m.

Appoint of commissioners on old-age pensions and old-age insurance.

Providing for the safety and health of foundry workers by minimizing drafts and doing away with noxious gases, and so forth, by exhaust fans in foundries.

Increasing factory inspectors by the number of 6—making in all a total of 17—for the better enforcement of factory and workshop laws.

Eight-hour day on State, county, and municipal work.

Providing for at least one-half hour meal time for six continuous hours of labor.

A plumbers' license act.

Providing for sanitation in bakeshops, and so forth, and also compelling the licensing of same.

Prohibiting the employment of persons under 21 years in first-class cities and 18 years in second-class cities as telephone or telegraph messengers between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m.

A semimonthly pay act for railroad employees.

Eliminating contract labor in penal institutions and providing for a State-use system.

And because of this magnificent record in behalf of the toiling masses, the laboring people of New Jersey love this governor. When he went into office he found her citizens prostrate under the tyranny and oppression of the bosses and tools of the special interests, and before six months had expired he had written all these things into the statutes of New Jersey and redeemed his pledges which he made during the campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He had done more in these few months than all the Republicans for 20 years; and yet we hear this idle talk that Wilson is not the friend of labor. We meet the Republican Party on any part of the ground in this contest, and our candidate will be found able to stand any sort of test applied to him. [Applause.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] has undertaken to put the stigma of unfriendliness to labor on the New Jersey governor. Let us see how well he can succeed. After these things above recited were performed by Gov. Wilson and the legislature under his administration, here is what the labor organization of New Jersey said. This is the message they sent to the people throughout the country. I incorporate it in my remarks in order that every honest voter may read it and see what the laboring people think of him in his own State. Because of this magnificent record in behalf of the toiling masses a glowing resolution was adopted by the labor people showing the high esteem in which Gov. Wilson is held because of those faithful performances. After reciting the large number of new laws passed by the Wilson administration favorable to labor, these resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That the executive board of the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, representing the organized workers of New Jersey, in regular session assembled this 13th day of February, 1912, at Trenton, N. J., hereby commend His Excellency Gov. Woodrow Wilson for his unremitting and untiring efforts in assisting to bring about better conditions for the wage earners of New Jersey: And be it further

Resolved, That the administration of Gov. Wilson be indorsed by the New Jersey State Federation of Labor, and that copies of these preambles and resolutions be forwarded to Gov. Woodrow Wilson, the public press of New Jersey, and the various labor organizations throughout the United States.

NEW JERSEY STATE FEDERATION OF LABOR.
HENRY F. HILFERS, Secretary.
CORNELIUS FORD, President.

This record ought to bring a quick apology from the gentleman from Illinois if he believes in a square deal and the truthful recital of facts. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Contrast such record with the miserable failure of Taft and Roosevelt in the performance of anything for the benefit of the laboring masses. The laboring people in New Jersey honor and love Wilson, and those who believe in truth and justice must quickly acquiesce in this statement if they make honest investigation. We challenge gentlemen to deny that statement. Gov. Wilson stands before this country as the friend of labor, while the Republican Party has made its record of broken promises. The labor organizations went to the Republican national convention in Chicago four years ago and you spurned them; you turned them away from that great convention. They went there this year and the Republican Party again turned a deaf ear. They went to the Baltimore convention and presented their requests and Democracy placed those requests in our platform, and we intend to redeem every one of them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

WILSON AND BRYAN.

The gentleman endeavors to fan into flames of fury a supposed difference between the Speaker of this House and William J. Bryan. It is not my purpose or province to here discuss the incident. Suffice it to say the Speaker is loyally supporting the nominee of his party, while the gentleman from Illinois seeks to defame Democracy's standard bearer. The Speaker of this House has been able to take care of himself on every occasion, and I am sure has not lost his superb ability in that respect, and will continue to do so. He is present in this House and needs no defense here when his name is brought in issue except his eloquent tongue, high character, and own strong record. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Nebraska, thrice the standard bearer of a great party, is absent and can not in this forum resent the vicious and almost brutal assault made on his good name by the strong standpat Republican from Illinois. This occasion is not the first one upon which the gentleman from Illinois in violent and unwarranted and, I might say, malevolent language has attacked the name and political integrity of the distinguished Nebraskan. Replying to the studied and almost indecent assault of the Illinois Member, permit me to say that no living American is better loved than Bryan. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Millions of citizens follow his unsullied flag of leadership, knowing full well that when his sword leaps from its scabbard it will be to fight in their defense. For two decades he has defiantly led the people's fight against entrenched privilege and predatory special interests. He is truly the Great Commoner of America. Ranking with Jefferson and Jackson and the immortal names enriching the achievements of Democracy, his name will be emblazoned in the permanent annals of history as the people's idol and courageous friend. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His character will stand forth in history typifying him as the people's redeemer in the century's struggle for political freedom and individual rights. Generations to come will teach their descendants to emulate his life as a model of consistency and ideal Christian citizenship. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

WILSON NOT AGAINST THE SOLDIERS.

The gentleman's quotation from Gov. Wilson's "History of the American People" is as follows, touching pensions. He seeks to array the old soldiers against Wilson:

What most attracted the attention of the country, aside from his action in the matter of appointments to office, was the extraordinary number of his vetoes. Most of them were uttered against pension bills, great and small. Both Democratic House and Republican Senate were inclined to grant any man or class of men who had served in the Federal Armies during the Civil War the right to be supported under the National Treasury, and Mr. Cleveland set himself resolutely to check their extravagance. He deemed it enough that those who had been actually disabled should receive pensions from the Government and regarded additional gifts for mere service both an unjustifiable use of the public money and a gross abuse of charity.

No other human being but the gentleman from Illinois would contend that Wilson was doing anything except giving Cleveland's position from his standpoint. He was not making such contention for himself.

The Baltimore platform reads:

We renew the declarations of our last platform relating to generous pensions.

I declare that Wilson stands squarely on this plank and will carry forward its provisions with sacred fidelity. The gentleman plainly, and apparently knowingly, misinterprets the language quoted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, such are the quotations made from Gov. Wilson's books intended to condemn him before the American people. They have already been read and reread in every part of this country prior to the Baltimore convention, and in that forum these things were all considered, and finally in spite of them Gov. Wilson was triumphantly nominated. Notwithstanding these unjust attacks, he is the choice of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to contrast him with the candidates of the other party. It is not what a man has said in years gone upon which the people are going to try the candidates in this contest. They will say to themselves, "What has this man accomplished? Is he honest, and what will he do if we elevate him to the Presidency?" There are some plain things that I shall charge here in contrasting these candidates.

CONTRASTING WILSON WITH TAFT AND ROOSEVELT.

First, let me analyze the political character of Theodore Africanus, the Mad Mullah of American politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He parades himself as the people's advocate, and yet I charge and will establish that he is the friend and instrument of the special interests and the predatory classes seeking favors at the hands of the Government. In fact, I think and feel sure their causes and interests are linked together as "two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one." Roosevelt, ensconced on the bosom of Perkins, Gary, and the minions of the Steel Trust, whispers sweet sympathy in their ears in New York City and is sent forth in the rest of the country to preach a sham crusade in behalf of the people's rights and against the trusts and predatory interests. We owe the duty of plain speech in this crisis, and I do not intend to fail to-day in its performance as a representative of the people. Before I have finished I believe it can be established that Roosevelt is backed by those interests and will become their willing instrument in the future, as he was in the past when President.

But, first, however, permit me to read some utterances from the books and speeches of Roosevelt, showing his attitude toward "labor," the "farmers," and "government by injunction." In comparison with these statements the quotations from Gov. Wilson reproduced by the gentleman from Illinois are as mild as a May morning. Here they are:

ROOSEVELT'S ESTIMATES OF COWBOYS.

They are much better fellows and pleasanter companions than small farmers or agricultural laborers; nor are the mechanics and workmen of a great city to be mentioned in the same breath.

We relish the memory of the cowboys, but why should he contemptuously stigmatize the farmers, mechanics, and workmen of the cities?

OF FARMERS.

I shall confine my remarks to what Gen. Porter has said about patriotism. Patriotism comes first, and I hope you will not fail to display it next Tuesday. Mr. Bryan and his adherents have appealed to the basest set in the land—the farmers.

OF OPPONENTS OF GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION.

The men who object to what they style "government by injunction" are, as regards the essential principles of government, in hearty sympathy with their remote skin-clad ancestors who lived in caves, fought one another with stone-headed axes, and ate the mammoth and wooly rhinoceros. They are interesting as representing a geological survival, but they are dangerous whenever there is the least chance of their making the principles of this ages-buried past living factors in our present life. They are not in sympathy with men of good minds and sound civic morality.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, has it come to this, that I am associating in this House with friends of labor like HUGHES of New Jersey, ROBERT E. LEE and WILSON of Pennsylvania, BUCHANAN, of Illinois, and a score of labor representatives who are "not in sympathy with men of good minds and sound civic morality"? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

ROOSEVELT'S CONNECTION WITH MERGER OF TENNESSEE CO. AND STEEL TRUST.

Let us analyze thoroughly his disgraceful connection with the merger of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. as a part of the Steel Trust. Here his unholy alliance and conspiracy with them began. Here he linked up with and became a part and parcel of the Steel Trust and became Perkins's and Gary's friend, ally, and instrument. They constitute the greatest financial organization and combination in the world's history. He has never forsaken them and is now making this fight for them and under their wing and direction. They have not separated and will not should he again win the Presidency, as long as Roosevelt serves them with the same fidelity characterizing his conduct in the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. and the indecent and outrageous covering up and suppression of the misdeeds and crimes of the Harvester Trust officials, his other political sponsors and financial backers in this contest.

Permit me to discuss Perkins and his methods for a few moments in order to lay his real character before this presence. I have had a good Democrat, who knows Perkins through and through, to make an estimate of him and his devious political and financial methods in order that I may photograph it in this record and show the kind of "birds" that "flock together" when Roosevelt and Perkins are "flocking" with one another. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is his estimate:

Roosevelt will have at his disposal as much money as both the other parties, and he has in Mr. George W. Perkins the most astute, untiring, and far-seeing organizer that our country has ever known. Do not for a moment underrate Mr. Perkins. I know him and his methods almost as intimately as any man can know them. It is to Mr. Perkins's efforts that the United States Steel Corporation and the Harvester Co. owed more of their organization at the outset than to any other man. It will be found that he and his assistants are now silently at work in their underground way setting up Roosevelt clubs and organizations all over the land, and that by autumn he will have a more perfect machine.

How do these things look, showing Roosevelt's financial affiliations and political moorings as compared with the clean and honorable man against whom the gentleman from Illinois urges quotations showing merely political opinions as written in his books? Compare these two candidates, and which must suffer the most in public esteem?

Permit me here to analyze the Harvester Trust conspiracy between Roosevelt, Herbert Knox Smith, Strauss, George W. Perkins, and E. H. Gary. If those things had been known to the American people when they happened under Roosevelt impeachment proceedings would have resulted and criminal prosecution been demanded against Perkins, Gary, and the McCormicks.

Allow me to call attention of Representatives to a few facts. This merger occurred in 1907. Gary came to Washington; Perkins also came, and they went to Roosevelt when he was President of the United States and asked if they could make the merger, and he agreed to it. He said, "I was personally cognizant of and responsible for its every detail." He did not stand in the way of it, and authorized the Steel Trust to absorb their greatest competitor for a price far less than the real value of the holding. Again he said, "I felt no public duty of mine to interpose any objection." Clandestinely he knowingly allowed them to get a huge monopoly on the iron-ore and raw-material supply of the country.

What did it mean? It meant that the special interests composed of his personal friends could go to him and confer with him. Let not the attitude of the Democracy and of our candidate be misunderstood. We are not against wealth legitimately acquired. We are not opposed to legitimate corporate interests; we believe they are essential. But we are against monopolies, we are opposed to combinations in restraint of trade, and we do oppose these men who would secretly conspire with the President of the United States in violation of the antitrust laws of the country, as was done by these conspirators with Roosevelt, and as was found and denounced as criminal by the Senate committee in 1907. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The absorption appears to have been contrary to the provisions of the antitrust law. * * * The transaction appears to be within the prohibition of the Federal statute. * * * And the President was not authorized to permit the absorption of the Tennessee Co. by the Steel Corporation.

Thus the committee found. He knew he was violating the law, but wished to accommodate the Steel Trust magnates, his personal friends, and did not stop at the violation of his oath and the laws of his country if he could make himself solid with these commercial pirates whom he expected to aid and finance him in his campaigns.

We are making no assault on wealth. We would defend the legitimate rights of the corporations as loyally as those of the individual. We are engaging in no warfare on corporations; we would defend their just rights as faithfully as we would those of the humblest citizen of this land. But what Democracy and her candidate stand for is absolute equality before the law whether it be a corporation or an individual. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the Senate of the United States will allow the Pujo bill, endowing the Money Trust committee with ample power, now pending there, to come out of the Senate and become a law, the American people will know more about this unholy alliance. I do not know whether they dare to let it come forth or not, but we ought to have the truth and understand these questions. Already the committee investigating the Money Trust affairs have uncovered enough things to repay us for ordering the investigation. It can be badly crippled if the special interests can smother the bill.

Perkins and Gary and the Steel Trust and the Harvester Trust are running and financing Roosevelt. Let me remind you that recently in the city of New York the Money Trust Investigating Committee, upon slight inquiry, ascertained that in 1907, the same year in which Roosevelt winked at and allowed the combination of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. and the Steel Trust, within 48 hours there was sent from the Treasury of the United States of the people's money $42,000,000, without one dime of interest, to J. Pierpont Morgan, ostensibly to stop the panic of that year. He instructed his Secretary, Mr. Cortelyou, to carry the money to the Wall Street gamblers, speculating in stocks and bonds and illegal transactions throughout this country, to be parceled out to them by Morgan and Perkins and that coterie of financiers. Morgan told the American people that he stopped the panic with his money, that it was $25,000,000 of his money that brought an end to the panic, whereas this investigation has revealed that it was the money of the people, taken secretly from the vaults of the Treasury and carried to New York under the direction of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Cortelyou, in order that it might be loaned to these gamblers on Wall Street without interest. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Perkins said to Morgan in the conference, when Cortelyou was there: "I think you ought to loan $25,000,000 to stop this panic." Morgan said, "All right; you can have my money," and then Perkins said, "Mr. Morgan, I think you ought to parcel this $25,000,000 out to various men and institutions in New York." Parcel it out! How? They parceled out the people's tax money to stock gamblers, the men who had been fattening and feasting on the bone and sinew and blood of our citizens for the last 40 years.

Morgan took the people's money and concealed the fact, and boasted that he stopped the panic, and charged those gamblers interest. The Money Trust investigation revealed the fact that the people thought Morgan had been their savior. In 1907 we have this combination between these two great rivals in the iron and steel business, and in 1907 the Treasury of the United States was looted by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction and instruction of Roosevelt, and the money sent to New York to accommodate his friends, Morgan, Gary, and Perkins. Do the American people know that?

IMPORTANCE OF THE PUJO MONEY TRUST BILL PENDING IN THE SENATE.

I promise you gentlemen if the Senate will pass that bill and allow the power to go into the records of the institutions of these gentlemen in New York and elsewhere, we will unearth things that will make the American voters rise up and call the Democratic Congress blessed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They are fighting the Pujo bill to the death in the Senate as a last desperate effort, because they know if the Money Trust investigating committee is given power to go into the records of those great financial institutions, it is certain to be discovered the men to whom Morgan parceled out the people's money when Cortelyou took it to him in 1907, under Roosevelt's direction, the purposes for which it was expended, and many acts of criminality on the part of that coterie of financiers. It would reveal a putrid condition of financial affairs on the part of those men, and that too in connection with the Government's funds, that would startle the civilized world. Hence the death grapple in the Senate now to stay the passage of that bill giving the people the right to examine the very creatures of the law, the great national banks. We of the South then will know how those gamblers manipulate the prices of cotton, and you in the West will understand how they send up and down the prices of your grain and cattle. And we will all learn how they have worked the stock markets, dislodged securities, and wrecked competitors and ruined their rivals throughout the length and breadth of this country. And that is the combination running this man Roosevelt before the American people to-day.

PROOF OF CONSPIRACY BETWEEN ROOSEVELT AND HARVESTER TRUST OFFICIALS—MORGAN, PERKINS, GARY, AND THE M'CORMICKS.

There is correspondence between the President, George W. Perkins, Herbert Knox Smith, and Mr. Strauss, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, which sets forth facts that every American should know covering up the affairs of the Harvester Trust. If those facts had been known in 1907 when the letters were written, impeachment proceedings would have been brought against the President and his Cabinet officer. For it is certain that he, Strauss, and Herbert Knox Smith deliberately entered into a conspiracy to violate the antitrust law and protect the International Harvester Co. Furthermore, criminal proceedings would have been insituted against Perkins and Gary and the McCormicks, if the facts had been known. Roosevelt was willing then for his friends—Perkins, Gary, and the McCormicks—to grind the farmers, whom he professes to love, with exorbitant charges for harvesters, reapers, and agricultural implements. He was cheerfully acquiescent in allowing the law to be violated daily, facts within his knowledge to be concealed from the public pointing to criminality, in order that "good trusts," as Herbert Knox Smith terms them, might fatten and feast upon the agricultural classes, because it was composed of his friends. He was willing to inclose "confidential" letters to his Attorney General not to prosecute the trust, which has since pleaded guilty to violating the law. May the people save the country from such a candidate. He wrote Mr. Bonaparte, his Attorney General, "Do not prosecute that Harvester Trust organized by Perkins and Gary." He said to Mr. Strauss, his Cabinet officer, "You must not molest those men for violating the antitrust law." He called on this man, Herbert Knox Smith, for a report, and Smith sent it to him. Smith admits the trust. In this document sent by Smith it is proved they have violated the antitrust law, and Smith writes that it is a fact they are guilty of committing crime, but he maintains these men are great financiers and combined with Perkins and the Morgan interests. They tell Smith, he writes, "If you allow this prosecution, they are going to fight." Mr. Speaker, there never was a more scandalous and disgraceful document lodged in the archives of this country than this letter, and correspondence, dated April 24, 1912. It could not be gotten from the records of that department until the Senate commanded it, and then it came only after the second demand. It showed that Roosevelt, and Bonaparte, and Strauss, and Herbert Knox Smith knew of these violations of the law and they were covering up the criminal acts of Roosevelt's friends. Allow me to quote some parts of that telltale correspondence. It is deplorable that it can not go in full to the home of every voter in the land. Here are some excerpts. Herbert Knox Smith writes Roosevelt:

On January 18 and 19, 1907, Mr. Garfield and myself met at New York City Messrs. Gary, McCormick, Deering, and Perkins, all directors of the said company, and went over generally the subject matter of the company's organization and operation, receiving, so far as I know, absolutely frank and complete answers and further assurance of complete cooperation in carrying out the investigation.

Smith writes, referring to Perkins:

That, as he phrased it, he was now being laughed at in New York by the Standard Oil people, who were saying that he had tried to be good and keep solid with the administration, but that now he was going to get the same dose as other people who had not followed such policy. He concluded with great emphasis with the remark that if, after all the endeavors of this company and the other Morgan interests to uphold the policy of the administration and to adopt their methods of modern publicity, this company was now to be attacked in a purely technical case, the interests he represented were "going to fight."

* * * * * * *

This case raises the question included in what the President has called "good and bad trusts"; the question whether mere combination, as such, shall be prohibited; whether the Government is going to try to forbid all combinations regardless of their methods or ends, or whether, on the other hand, it is going to pursue the policy, frequently stated by the President, of regulation and control rather than of prohibition.

* * * * * * *

Smith comments:

I believe that industrial combination is an economic necessity, that the Sherman law, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, is an economic absurdity and is impossible of general enforcement, and even if partially enforced, will, in most cases, work only evil. I believe the principle it represents must ultimately be abandoned; that combination must be allowed and then regulated, and that the best means of regulation is by publicity, aided by the action of the Department of Justice and of the courts in case of proven violation of the interstate-commerce laws and other laws which deal with unfair methods of business.

Here he shows his contempt for the Supreme Court and the law and advocates open defiance to serve the trusts.

He here states the essence of the conspiracy between the President, Perkins, the Morgan interests, and the Harvester Trust officials:

While the administration has never hesitated to grapple with any financial interest, no matter how great, when it is believed that a substantial wrong is being committed, nevertheless, it is a very practical question whether it is well to throw away now the great influence of the so-called Morgan interests, which up to this time have supported the advanced policy of the administration, both in the general principles and in the application thereof to their specific interests, and to place them generally in opposition.

A careful study of this document will prove that Roosevelt was studiously protecting and cautiously concealing the misdeeds of his friends who are now financing this campaign for him.

See the "confidential" letter from Loeb to show his secretiveness:

OYSTER BAY, N. Y., September 24, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The President directs me to send you, for your confidential reading, the inclosed letters from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor and the Commissioner of Corporations concerning the Harvester Trust. * * *

Very truly, yours,

WM. LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President.

Hon. CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Attorney General.

The document shows that Morgan and Perkins were backing all these interests. The people were not satisfied; they demanded investigation. They said this trust that Roosevelt protected must be prosecuted. And it was investigated, and the trust threw up its hands and said, "We are guilty of violating the law and will dissolve. We can no longer be protected, because we have defied the law." The present Attorney General is now endeavoring to agree upon a decree for dissolution. And these men have confessed they are guilty. They had to do it after they were exposed. I make no attack on Roosevelt, but shall let the record condemn him. There it is. Read the Senate document and put it in the hands of the American voters, and they will wonder why there were not impeachment proceedings and why these things did not leak out. And this Harvester Trust covered up by these men has at last been run to cover; they have surrendered and now are dissolving. And these same men—Perkins and Morgan and the McCormicks—who financed them and were sponsors for that trust are the men who are sponsoring Roosevelt in this contest. And I want to say in simple justice to that brave Democrat, that knightly gentleman, that courageous man, and his coworkers on his committee, the Hon. A. O. STANLEY, of Kentucky, that it was by his investigation of the Steel Trust that the prosecution was forced. They uncovered this felony and laid it bare before the American people, and the Attorney General was compelled to bring suit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Am I unfair when I make that statement? Is it not a fact? Did not Theodore say in Massachusetts, "Yes, Perkins is my friend, and I do not deny him; I always acknowledge my friends." Ah, he is more than a friend. He has tried clandestinely to be his savior in this contest. He is his faithful ally.

TAFT—HIS BROKEN PROMISES.

What can I say of Mr. Taft? What should be said of him? It does seem harsh, indeed, to speak in uncomplimentary terms of one almost politically dead. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Let me examine two or three salient points in Mr. Taft's record and study their significance. He said in Milwaukee before the election four years ago:

It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there will probably be a few exceptions in this regard.

He promised a revision downward. He went into office on that speech; the voters believed him; but since he became President the Democrats reduced the tariff, schedule after schedule, and sent the bills to him, only to meet his veto with pledges broken. Why? Because he is helpless to do anything else. He stood with the men who are the beneficiaries through the protective tariff and could not keep his word. In some of his speeches he said he had to veto the bills for the sake of "party solidarity." Has it come to this that any President will sacrifice his whole country for party solidarity, and especially the solidarity of the present Republican party? Where is his party solidarity now? Roosevelt after him from one direction and the people from the other, the Republican Party is hopelessly divided because it broke its word of promise. Then he said:

With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high and that it ought to have been reduced. I am not saying that the tariff does not increase prices in clothing and in building and in other items that enter into the necessities of life.

He admits that the tariff is too high, and yet, when Congress reduces it and sends reduction bills to him, he vetoes them. And when we send the reduction bills now pending to him, we are informed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that he will also veto them. He admits that the records of the Treasury Department for the year 1911 show that the wool duties under the Payne law range from 61 per cent to 157 per cent. The protective duties are enormous and out of all reason. The President knows and admits it, and yet will not and can not yield relief to the oppressed masses through Executive approval of our measures. If he is determined to veto all reductions of the tariff taking the burdens off the backs of the people, when will he be able to shake himself loose from special privileged classes and those who are seeking favors at the hands of the Government? In God's name, when the strike investigation revealed that children are starving and crying for bread in Lawrence, Mass.; when they are without clothing; when they are forced to drink unwholesome water from the factories and pay 5 and 10 cents a week for it, living on starvation wages; when factory hands, heads of families with families of six and seven are getting $6 and $7 per week, the wool trust protected with duties ranging all the way from 60 per cent to 180 per cent, when will the President sanction the reduction of those burdens? He is willing to witness the squalor and suffering, all those hideous things brought by that investigation to his very eyes which aroused the sympathy of the good women of the country as they flocked by the hundreds to hear the statements of those factory workers who have been ground to the dust by the protected industries and the American Woolen Trust. And yet Mr. Taft stands with them and against those who toil in this Republic. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His acceptance speech at the White House the other day indicated that he has taken the back track, which means he knows the people have forsaken him, and now he throws himself into the embraces of those who control frenzied finances and "big business" and establishes himself again in that speech as the candidate of the special interests and so-called big business.

In contrast with him to-day as the President who has broken his sacred avowal of tariff reduction to the people in order that he still might bask in the smiles of the protective-tariff favorites fattening through the instrumentality of the Government out of the pockets of the great masses of the overburdened public, we present to the country Woodrow Wilson, who never broke a pledge and with an unchallenged record of every promise to the people faithfully redeemed.

The Republican Party talks about government by injunction, and yet Mr. Taft is the father of government by injunction. Never has he done a thing to show his friendship to labor. Let me refer you to two of his decisions when he was a circuit judge. In the case of the Toledo A. A. & M. M. Railway Co. v. The Pennsylvania Co. (54 Fed. Rep., Apr. 13, 1903), you will find his sympathies were all with what is called "big business" and against the men who toil in the factories, in the mines, and on the railroads. Read the decision delivered on July 13, 1894, when Mr. Taft was a Federal judge. He showed his contempt for the rights of labor under the Constitution. He dragged far away from his home Frank W. Phelan and imprisoned him in the county jail of Warren County, Ohio, for six months without the poor privilege of being tried by a jury of his peers. He thus exemplified his antipathy to the rights of labor and became the father of government by injunction. The case is styled Thomas v. The Cincinnati N. O. & T. P. R. R. Co. (62 Fed. Rep.), and throws a flood of light upon the temperament and tendencies of Mr. Taft. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentleman, I shall not occupy your time now with the recital, but shall place in the RECORD the achievements of the Democratic Party in this Congress under the wise guidance of the great Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and other prominent Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I submit that this is an enviable record of achievement and constructive capacity on the part of the Democratic Party.

A PART OF THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD OF THE SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

1. A bill prohibits dealing in cotton futures.
2. A bill limits to eight hours the daily service of laborers and mechanics employed on Government work.
3. We have passed various tariff bills revising the wool, cotton, steel, and chemical schedules, and a farmers' and laborers' free-list bill, giving free farming implements, free cotton bagging and ties, and free meat and bread to the American people.
4. Amended the rules of the House and eliminated Cannonism by providing for the election of committees by the membership of the House.
5. Provided for a parcels post and governmental aid for public roads.
6. A bill authorizes the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton.
7. A bill provides for levying an excise tax on incomes.
8. A bill creates a department of labor.
9. A bill provides for publicity of contributions and expenditures for the purpose of influencing the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President.
10. A bill protects American trade and shipping from domestic and foreign monopolies.
11. A bill gives the accused the right of trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.
12. A bill limits the power of Federal judges in the issuance of writs of injunction.
13. A joint resolution submits to the States an amendment to the Federal Constitution that United States Senators shall be elected directly by the people.
14. A bill provides for free sugar.
15. The House has authorized and directed investigations of the Steel Trust, the Beef Trust, the Shipping Trust, and the Money Trust.
16. We have passed bills for the better protection of life at sea.
17. Admitted Arizona and New Mexico to statehood.
18. Passed a bill abrogating the Russian treaty of citizenship.
19. We have passed at this session a bill creating a commission to investigate industrial conditions, and will pass a bill to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States.
20. We have passed the seamen's wage bill in behalf of labor and a righteous measure.

Thus we present a part of the record to the country. Who would undo it? It has been said that the Democratic Party is one of negation and not of constructive statesmanship. And yet I assert here to-day that within less than two years Democracy has passed through the House more measures of benefit to the people of America than the Republican Party has given them since the conclusion of the Civil War. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Some have asserted that the Democratic Party is not constructive, but I assert that if the voters will reinvest us with power, if they will elect a Democratic Senate, and give the country New Jersey's great governor for President, we will redeem every pledge and bring relief to the people that they have not known during the last half century.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party is a constructive party. Its birth was coeval with that of the Republic. It sprang into life with the Constitution. We have won contests and we have lost some, but during all those conflicts our party has been representing the people's cause. Democracy is destined to live while liberty is loved and constitutional government is cherished. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have seen other parties go to defeat. We have witnessed them dissolve and pass from the scenes of action, as the Republican Party is now dissolving. And still Democracy abides with us as the party of representative government and the hope of the masses. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We know, we assert, and the people shall know, that we are representing their cause in this contest. We charge that both the candidates of the Republican Party are fighting for the few, the few who would put their hands into the pockets of the masses and fatten at their expense. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That they stand for the principle that would build a high protective-tariff system, establish monopolies, and oppress the consumers.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to add in conclusion that if Gov. Wilson and his party are not fighting the cause of the people in this great conflict, the greatest political battle since the beginning of this Government, we are not entitled to win. If Democracy wavers in this crisis, it does not deserve to triumph and has no right to live. Standing in my place to-day as a Representative of the people, I say with all the fervor of my soul that Democracy carries the unsullied banner of the people's cause, and when this conflict is ended will again have earned the right to their enduring confidence. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

STEEL TRUST INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at 11 o'clock, the House proceed to the discussion of the report (H. Rept. 1127) of the committee investigating the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation—from 11 o'clock in the morning to 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of fact, the House meets without special agreement at 12 o'clock.

Mr. STANLEY. Then, I move that the House meet on that day at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], as a part of his request, asks that when the House adjourns next Wednesday it adjourn to meet on Thursday at 11 o'clock, and immediately after the reading of the Journal it shall proceed to the discussion of the report on the Steel Trust, and continue from 11 o'clock until 5 o'clock, and have a night session from 8 o'clock until 11.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am glad and anxious for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to have the opportunity to discuss this important matter; but in the condition of public business at this time I do not think that any arrangements for unanimous consent should be agreed to without the reservation that they shall not conflict with appropriation bills and conference reports.

Mr. STANLEY. I accept that reservation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], so far as he is concerned, accepts that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think, in the present state of public business in the House and in Congress, that there ought to be any agreement to set aside a day a week ahead for the consideration for any proposition. When Wednesday comes, if the state of business is such that the House can use Thursday for debate on the steel investigation, I shall be very glad to have it done and will make no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in to-day's issue of the Washington Post is an article on the situation relative to the pension appropriation bill, and in it is this passage:

SENATOR M'CUMBER EXPLAINS.

Prompt passage of the pension bill was predicted last night by Senator MCCUMBER, who declared that the abandonment of the pension agencies, as proposed by the House and opposed by the Senate, would be a false economy.

"The pensions have been held up chiefly because of the absence from the city of two members of the joint committee," Senator MCCUMBER stated last night. "They are Representative WILLIAM P. BORLAND, of Missouri, and Representative CHARLES L. BARTLETT, of Georgia. But a settlement will soon be reached, and I believe that the appropriation will be passed either Monday or early next week, making the entire $165,000,000 available.

This purported statement is so grossly unjust, so manifestly unfair, and so lacking in every element of truth that I know that Senator MCCUMBER never uttered it. But if those who read it are not familiar with the facts, it is important, in justice to these two gentlemen, as well as to this House, that the facts be stated.

The House passed the pension appropriation bill (H. R. 18985) on the 2d of February. It passed the Senate on the 30th of May. The House disagreed to the Senate amendments on the 1st of June. The Senate insisted upon its amendments on the 4th of June and asked for a conference. Since that time, as I am reliably informed from different sources, the managers upon the part of the House have been going back and forth to the Senate, endeavoring to reach some agreement upon this bill, and have been treated with a contempt and a discourtesy that, in my opinion, would have justified the raising of a question involving the privileges of the House.

A gentleman in charge of this bill in one instance received a note requesting him to attend a conference at the place usually fixed, and when he arrived there, he was informed that he could not see the Senator in charge of the conference on behalf of the other body and was denied admission to the room. He was permitted to talk to a clerk of the Senate. My information is that the managers upon the part of the House, although frequently, day after day, seeking an opportunity to confer with the Senators, have never been able to meet with them more than about four times. Finally the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], despairing of getting any agreement whatever upon any item in the pension appropriation bill, left the city because of important business. At my suggestion the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] communicated to the Senators that unless they were willing either to make an agreement upon the amendments or to report a disagreement to the Senate, he would take advantage of the first opportunity that occurred in the House to state to the House what the situation was and why no agreement could be reached. And finally, upon the 25th day of July, after a number of suggestions of various kinds had been offered by the House, the Senate representatives were induced to sign a report of disagreement. Every amendment in the pension appropriation bill proposed by the Senate was speedily acquiesced in by the Representatives of the House, excepting those which the Senate added providing for the abolishment of 17 useless pension agencies. The conference report was signed on the 25th of July. It was presented to the House on that day by the gentlemen in charge of the conference on the part of the House. It has never seen the light of day in the Senate. Under the rules of procedure action must be taken first in the Senate, and until the gentleman at the other end of the Capitol who has that conference report stowed securely either in his pocket or some secluded pigeonhole will consent to present it to the Senate, it is impossible for any action to be taken.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Where are the original papers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The original papers are practically in my possession. They have never left the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. How can the Senate act upon the conference report without having the original papers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows that the Senate is entitled to the possession of the papers and will have them if it desires. If no one will raise the question as to our right to proceed I shall very gladly call up the conference report to-day and determine on behalf of the House what shall be done. The Senate can then determine whether it will deprive deserving and needy soldiers of their pension within the next few days simply from a desire to retain 17 offices at an expense of $200,000 a year which, since 1885, efforts have been made to abolish.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly; but, first, let me say one thing further about the possession of the papers. It is not due to any fault or trick on behalf of the House, but apparently the Senate did not desire the papers.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York knows that the rules of the Senate with reference to conference reports are unlike the rules of the House, in that they do not require the conference report to be printed before it is agreed to by the Senate. The gentleman further knows that neither body can act on a conference report without having the original papers in its possession. Now, how can the Senate conferees present their conference report and ask for its consideration, which is the practice in the Senate, unless they have possession of the papers which have not yet been turned over to them? May it not be a matter of misunderstanding?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman need not be alarmed about that situation. The papers are safely put away awaiting the request of the Senate for them and an indication that it really desires them and will take care of them and not lose them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I may continue, on the 4th of August a very large number of pensions should be paid. The bill as it passed the House carried $152,000,000 for the payment of pensions during the current year. The Senate adopted an amendment increasing the amount to $164,500,000, and the conferees on the part of the House accepted that amendment. Under the resolution adopted on the 1st of July one-twelfth of $152,000,000 was made available for the payment of pensions during the month of July. Under the resolution adopted on the 1st of August one twenty-fourth of $152,000,000 was made available on the 1st of August for the payment of pensions during the month of August. As nearly as I can ascertain it will require about $15,000,0000 to pay the pensions——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As I was saying, it will require about $15,000,000 to meet the obligations. About $6,500,000 will be available, and about $9,000,000 additional will be required. Senator MCCUMBER introduced a joint resolution in the Senate on the 1st of August which recites that owing to a disagreement between the two Houses the appropriations for pensions have not been made. "Whereas," the resolution reads, "it is probable that some considerable time will elapse before an agreement shall be reached upon said bill"—somewhat inconsistent with the statement purported to have been uttered by the Senator to-day or last night that there would be an agreement by Monday or Tuesday. Whereas about $30,000,000 will be needed, it proposes to appropriate $30,000,000 for the payment of these pensions.

Mr. Speaker, prior to 1885 pension agents were paid by fees, and they were among the most lucrative offices in the gift of the entire Government. In 1885 the House of Representatives, which was then Democratic, passed a pension appropriation bill with a provision reducing the number of agents to 12 and specifically fixing their compensation at $4,000 a year. The Senate, which was Republican—a similar situation to that of to-day—increased the number of pension agents to 18 and assented to the salary of $4,000 a year.

During the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses, in 1908, 1909, 1910, and 1911, the Republican House of Representatives passed in the appropriation bill provisions providing for the abolition of these offices. At this session of Congress we voted to abolish these offices. In the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there were 107 votes in favor and 16 votes against the proposition, and the bill was passed with a record vote of 243 ayes and 33 noes. In the last Congress the managers on the part of the House were the gentleman from Ohio, Gen. Keifer, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Gardner, both of whom served with great distinction in the Civil War, and both of whom unquestionably had at heart the interests of the old soldiers, believed that the continuance of these pension agents was indefensible, particularly as the Commissioner of Pensions had stated before the Committee on Appropriations the only excuse for their continuation was to provide 17 places at $4,000 for deserving persons.

Mr. Speaker, many attempts have been made, as I have pointed out, to get rid of these useless offices. On the 6th of February, 1897, President Cleveland by Executive order reduced the number to nine, to take effect December 1, 1897. On the 14th of July of the same year President McKinley issued an order suspending the consolidation of the agencies. I do not intend to say anything in criticism of President McKinley, because I am convinced from my investigation of this matter that unless by positive legislation these agencies be abolished the pressure for the places will be so great that it is practically impossible for the President to execute the power he has under the statute to consolidate them.

I have received during this session of Congress a large number of resolutions from Grand Army posts protesting against the continuation of these agencies and stating that the men who served in the Civil War have no desire that money be squandered uselessly in this way, but that whatever is chargeable against the pension roll shall be paid to the deserving soldiers who are entitled to their pensions.

It has been said that this has not been recommended officially; that it is simply a desire to make a showing. Without taking the time of the House, I shall ask permission to append to my remarks the statements made by the various Commissioners of Pensions every year since 1906 before the Committee on Appropriations, showing that these agencies should be abolished, as well as the report of the Secretary of the Interior in 1907, showing that there would be an increased efficiency in the payment of the pensions and the elimination of every possible delay, and that there would be an actual saving of $200,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, we are face to face with this situation: The House has accepted and is willing to agree to all of the Senate amendments providing the money necessary to pay the pensions due to the soldiers. It has declined to appropriate or to countenance a continuation of unnecessary, useless offices. If there be delay or inconvenience to the old soldier in the payment of the pensions within the next few days, it is due to the fact that the Senate, because of the interest of a few Senators, who imagine that their political fortunes will be advanced by the retention of these agencies, decline to consent to the abolition of useless agencies. This is not a partisan question in this House. Both sides of the House have acquiesced in this movement. The House, when under the control of both parties, has recommended that these agencies be abolished, and it has done whatever is possible to abolish them. The conferee from that side of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], I am informed, is in accord with the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Missouri; and I think it is not only unfortunate but grossly unjust, when whatever delay may be occasioned from the failure to pay these pensions is due to the greed of a few men desiring to retain useless offices, that an attempt should be made to attribute it to the absence of gentlemen who were not only here but who exerted everything in their power and exercised the patience of Job in the attempt to adjust the differences between the two Houses.

I wish the House and the country to know that if there be any inconvenience, if there be any delay, the responsibility for it is not upon the House, not upon Members upon either side of the House, but that it belongs at the other end of the Capitol. If that branch of the Legislature desires to take the responsibility for delaying and preventing these pensions being paid in order to protect political appointees, it must take it with the knowledge of the facts in possession of the country. [Applause.]

On January 19, 1906, this transpired in the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the commissioner what is the necessity of having 18 pension agencies.

Mr. WARNER—

Who was then Commissioner of Pensions—

None whatever. They should be reduced to six. That could be done by an Executive order.

Commissioner Warner said later:

If I had the power, I would decrease the number of agencies in the United States to six.

Mr. KEIFER. Who can do that?

Mr. WARNER. The President can do it by an Executive order.

On January 17, 1907, Mr. Warner, Commissioner of Pensions, was before the Committee on Appropriations, and speaking of the work of his bureau, he said:

I have no complaint to make of the organization, or laws, or anything else, so far as that is concerned. There is only one point; that is the question of the agencies for the payment of pensions throughout the United States. That is within the control of the President, as to the number of them. There are now 18, and I think it would be good policy to reduce the number to 9, anyway.

Mr. GARDNER. Have you any recommendation to make in that respect?

Mr. WARNER. It is entirely within the control of the President. I recommend that the number be reduced from 18 to 9, but of course it is an embarrassing proposition. There are 18 agents, at $4,000 salary each, scattered around over the United States, and Senators and Representatives are interested in them, etc. You do not have to tell a Member of Congress what that means. I think it would be economy in policy to reduce the number to 9. It could be reduced to 6.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Do you think that would improve the efficiency of the service?

Mr. WARNER. I think it would benefit the efficiency of the service, because you can do business better with 1 man than with 3, and you can do business better with 9 than with 18 agencies. You can enforce policies better with 9 than 18. The checks and vouchers would be made all the same then. As it is now we have separate checks for each agency with the agent's name printed in them and a separate voucher for each agency.

On January 27, 1908, Commissioner Warner said:

As far as I personally am concerned it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor. But looking at it from a business point of view and as if it were my own business, I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government and it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected more quickly, information obtained at once, and the record kept in better shape.

On January 7, 1909:

Mr. KEIFER. On page 5 is the item for the salaries of 18 agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $72,000. That would be the same as before?

Mr. WARNER. Yes. I wish you could knock them down to 9.

Mr. BOWERS. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. WARNER. You would do it in a moment if it was your own business. You take New Hampshire and Maine and Massachusetts—three little agencies up there that would not make a vest pocketful, hardly.

On February 5, 1910:

Mr. KEIFER. If you care to state, will you please say whether you think it would be advisable to pay all of these pensions at one agency from Washington?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think it would be in the interest of economy.

Mr. KEIFER. Have you made any calculations as to what would be the approximate saving of money if they were all paid from one agency?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have not the figures before me, but I think we would save about $200,000.

In the report of the Secretary of the Interior, dated December 31, 1907, he says:

A special report, House Document No. 352, Sixtieth Congress, first session, has been made to Congress on the advisability of discontinuing all the agencies except the one in Washington. In the present condition of the roll this change would effect an immediate saving of approximately $200,000 a year, and there would be no loss in the efficiency of the service and in the promptness of payment to the pensioners.

PROPOSED CONSOLIDATION OF PENSION AGENCIES.

Letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a report in relation to the proposed reduction in the number of the pension agencies:

SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1907.

SIR: The "act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1907, contained the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall make inquiry and report to Congress, at the beginning of its next regular session, the effect of a reduction of the present pension agencies to one such agency upon the economic execution of the pension laws, the prompt and efficient payment of pensioners, and the inconvenience to pensioners, if any, which would result from such reduction. This provision shall not be construed as interfering with or limiting the right or power of the President under existing law in respect to reduction or consolidation of existing pension agencies."

In compliance with said provision I submit herewith the following report:

1. Economic execution of pension laws: The annual expenditure on account of the payment of pensions, including the salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, contingent expenses, and the printing of vouchers and checks, is approximately $550,000, an average cost per pensioner of 55 cents per annum. It is estimated that after a consolidation has been completed and in perfect working order, all pensioners could be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer, located in the city of Washington, with an annual expenditure of, at most, $350,000, a saving of 20 cents per annum per pensioner, or $200,000. After the first year of the consolidation, I am of the opinion that the appropriation for the expense of paying pensions could be safely reduced at least $25,000 more.

2. The prompt and efficient payment of pensioners: If all pensioners are paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, provision should be made for a division of the pensioners into three groups, one group to be paid each month, as at present, and all pensioners could be paid as promptly by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, as by 18 agents.

3. Inconvenience to pensioners: As all pensioners could be paid as promptly by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one disbursing officer, as by 18 agents, there would be no inconvenience to pensioners except the slight delay which would be caused in the case of pensioners living remote from Washington in the time required for a voucher to reach Washington through the mails and for the check to be returned. The checks would, however, be issued quarterly as now and the pensioner receive his payment regularly every three months after the receipt of the first payment. Many of the pensioners now paid by the San Francisco agency do not receive their checks until seven or eight days have expired from the date of mailing of vouchers. Pensioners now living in Montana, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, who are now paid by the San Francisco agency, would experience but a slight delay in receipt of their checks if paid in this city. In this connection attention is invited to the fact that there are 52,201 pensioners in the agency district paid by San Francisco. More than 10,000 of these pensioners are now being paid by other agencies, and there is no complaint of delay in receiving payment. All Navy pensioners residing in the Southern States are now paid by the Washington agency, and there is no complaint about delay in payment. There are 26,448 pensioners residing in the State of California. Of this number nearly 5,000 are not paid by the San Francisco agency, but are paid by other agencies.

There are certain other conditions to which attention should be invited if all pensions should be paid by the Commissioner of Pensions, or one central disbursing officer located in this city. The records would be readily accessible for reference by the bureau. A large amount of extra correspondence is now required to furnish information to correspondents relative to the payment of pensions. The bureau must first obtain such information from the pension agents, and a great deal of time is consumed in securing this information, especially from agencies located in distant cities.

All vouchers now required by pensioners are printed by the Government Printing Office in this city and forwarded to the different pension agents, there to be prepared and mailed to the pensioner with checks for the preceding quarter. All checks now used by the pension agents are likewise printed in this city. A considerable saving would result in the cost of printing vouchers and also in the cost of printing checks if such vouchers and checks were prepared for 1 agency rather than for 18.

All paid vouchers must be forwarded by the pension agents to the Auditor for the Interior Department in this city. There is always danger of the loss of such vouchers in the mails. Many vouchers of widow pensioners under the general law and under the act of June 27, 1890, were recently lost in transit from one of the pension agencies to the auditor in this city. No trace of the missing vouchers has as yet been discovered. The pension agent has since died, and his accounts can not be settled for many months on account of the lost vouchers.

It is further suggested that if it be decided to consolidate the 18 agencies into one agency the entire 18 agencies be abolished and provision be made that the payments be made by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The statute now provides (26 Stat. L., 138) that the pension agent, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may designate and authorize a clerk to sign the name of the pension agent to official checks. There are 18 such designated clerks now employed, one at each agency. The name of the pension agent is printed on all checks used, but before the check is issued it must be countersigned by the designated clerk. Only one clerk may be thus authorized to sign such checks for any one pension agent under the law as it now stands. If all pensioners were paid by the Commissioner of Pensions or by one disbursing officer the services of six or eight clerks would be required to sign such checks, and if the 18 agencies be abolished and all payments made by the Commissioner of Pensions or one disbursing officer provision should be made authorizing the Commissioner of Pensions or the disbursing officer, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to designate the necessary number of clerks to sign the name of the Commissioner of Pensions or disbursing officer to such official checks.

Ample accommodation for the consolidated agency could be furnished in the Pension Building.

Under the practice now in vogue there is a duplication of records. Each of the 18 agents receives from here the certificates of pensions for the pensioners residing in his district. A record is made here and also by the agent at the agency, who then forwards the certificate with the voucher to the pensioner. A consolidation of the agencies would require but one record of the certificate, etc., which would be kept in the office here in Washington, and the certificate and voucher would be mailed direct to the pensioner from here. This would do away with having the certificate mailed to the agent, the making of a record by the agent, and the mailing by him of the certificate and voucher to the pensioner.

It would seem that the law should leave to the discretion of the commissioner and the Secretary as to when the transfers from the different agencies should be made. To require all of such transfers to be made on one date would entail unnecessary work and might result in delay and complications in making payments.

If the 18 agencies are abolished and provision made for the payment of all pensions from the city of Washington, I respectfully suggest that an appropriation of at least $10,000 should be made, to be immediately available, for the purpose of carrying out the consolidation and defraying the necessary expenses of the removal of the records, etc., of the agencies to the city of Washington.

Very respectfully, JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this disagreement between the House and the Senate, protracted beyond the beginning of this fiscal year, is most unfortunate. Like everything else, there are two sides to the question. I am willing that it should be settled either way. I think it entirely likely that it is equally as efficient and slightly more economical to settle it according to the contention of the House, but there are $165,000,000 to be dispensed and, my friend says, $200,000 to be saved if the disbursement is from the city of Washington rather than throughout the country from the various agencies. On the other hand, it is claimed—whether truly so or not is not necessary for me to discuss—that it is more economical to continue the former practice, that the clerks throughout the country get about half the pay they do in the Pension Office, without any leave of absence, that the clerks in Washington would receive. I shall not go into the merits of it. I say, again, I think it is most unfortunate, and I would be glad, if there is any feeling about the matter, if the Senate is entitled to the papers, to see them transmitted to the Senate if there has been an agreement upon all except one point, because they must have the papers. I suppose they are entitled to them as a matter of right, although I did not know, I will say to the gentleman from New York, that they did not have the papers, that being the matter that did not come directly under my observation.

Now, how much will it take to pay the pensions during August; I did not catch it exactly?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My information is about $15,000,000.

Mr. CANNON. In addition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; all told.

Mr. CANNON. And how much is the deficiency; how much are we short?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Six and a half millions available under the extension resolution.

Mr. CANNON. That would be eight and a half millions additional necessary to pay the pensions starting to-morrow, is that right?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Starting on the 4th of August.

Mr. CANNON. Now, there is a rule of this House and a rule between the two bodies where an irresistible force meets an immovable body that we proceed under those rules, namely, that legislation shall not be carried by an appropriation bill unless both the House and the Senate agree.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no such rule in this House; there may be one in the other.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have found, and I fancy the gentleman has as well, when the Senate having insisted almost to the crack of doom on putting legislation upon appropriation bills that where the House has said we will not submit to legislation upon general appropriation bills that the Senate has been compelled to recede.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman understands this legislation is legislation designed to accomplish an administrative reform, and the House, being the guardian of the people's purse, has always insisted upon it.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; but it is legislation. Now, the Senate, if they invoke that rule and say they will not recede, there will be no legislation until the Senate does recede. In the meantime by misunderstanding, possibly by something of temper, something of insistence on the part of the House, and something of objection on the part of the Senate, there are eight and a half millions short of the necessary amount of money to pay the pensions to-morrow. Now, then, I fancy this matter, back and forth between the House and the Senate, will not be understood very much by the—how many—900,000 people who are upon the pension rolls.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for two minutes more, if I can get it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is more than I wish. I say again, I will not discuss the merits of this proposition between the House and the Senate, but I think that we would be justified, considering a further contention between an irresistible force and an immovable body that results in no legislation and no appropriation bill, I think I want to submit to the gentleman from New York if he will not ask unanimous consent as a member of the majority and as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to here and now pass a deficiency bill or a bill providing eight and a half million dollars to enable the 900,000 pensioners to be paid? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is a rule of legislative bodies that in passing any action in regard to a bill after the bill has been engrossed the House which acts upon it must be in physical possession of the papers, and the practice in reference to conference is this: This body disagreed to the Senate amendment and asked for a conference, sent a message to the Senate announcing that fact, and with the message the papers went also. The Senate agreed to the conference and sent a message to the House stating they had agreed to the conference, and with that message came the papers. The papers went into the hands, or should have gone into the hands, of the House conferees. The rule is that when an agreement is reached in conference the conferees having possession of the papers transfer them to the conferees of the other body, so that the body that asks for the conference is the body that acts last upon the conference report, and the body that agrees to the conference is the body that acts first upon the conference report. In this case, under this practice, it is the duty of the Senate to act first upon the conference report, and the papers should be in the hands of the Senate conferees. If there has been a conference report signed, when the conference report was signed the papers should have been delivered by the House conferees to the Senate conferees. I understand that that was not done. I think it should be done now. Now, Mr. Speaker, a word more.

I have been in favor for years of abolishing the pension agencies. I urged the conferees, when the Republicans were in a majority in the House, not to agree until the Senate receded from its amendment adding the pension agencies to the bill as it passed the House. And I still maintain that position. If it is a question of stubbornness between the House and the Senate, I can be just as stubborn as anybody in the Senate can be. [Applause.] I do not believe that the House ought to recede from its position. [Applause.] My colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who has just addressed the House, has been on more conference committees and had more experience in conference work than any other Member of the House or the Senate, and I have the highest respect for his opinion. The rule that he states is undoubtedly the rule as to legislative matters or new propositions, but in this case it is a question whether we appropriate the money for 17 pension agencies or 1 pension agency. I think that the logic of the rule is that when the House declines to appropriate for more than 1 pension agency the Senate must recede from its demand to have 16 extra agencies appropriated for. [Applause.] If the Senate wants to stand responsible before the country for the lack of money with which to pay the pensions now due, that responsibility is on the Senate and not on the House. [Applause.] The House is prepared to increase the amount of money provided by the Senate amendments to the appropriation bill, but I think is not prepared to provide the 16 extra pension agencies. I hope that the gentleman in charge of the House conferees will deliver the papers to the Senate conferees and leave the responsibility with them if they delay the appropriation. [Applause.]

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On August 3, 1912:

H. R. 21480. An act to establish a standard barrel and standard grades for apples when packed in barrels, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18642) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, and that the Senate had receded from its amendments numbered 3 and 4.

FRANCHISES GRANTED IN PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 894).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered printed. Also the accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs, with instructions that they be not printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 32 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of franchises granted by the Executive Council of Porto Rico, which are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War transmitting them to me. Such of these as relate to railroad, street railway, telegraph and telephone franchises, privileges or concessions have been approved by me, as required by the joint resolution of May 1, 1900 (31 Stat., 715).

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 3, 1912.

LAWS RELATIVE TO SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill H. R. 23673, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 23673) to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question. I thought the Clerk commenced back on page 14.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding was, although it may be wrong, that there were just two sections of this bill that had not been considered.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Speaker is mistaken. There are several sections that have not been considered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Clerk should finish this section, and then we will return to section 12.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will finish reading this section. Section 12 was passed, the Chair will state to the gentleman, and we can return to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What section is this?

The SPEAKER. Section 17, page 18. The Clerk will report the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That this act shall take effect as to all vessels of the United States 90 days after its passage and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, save and except that such parts hereof as provide for the abrogation of any stipulation by treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall only take effect after such notice and at the expiration of such time as may be required by the terms of such treaty stipulation or convention.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 13, by striking out the figures "17" and inserting in lieu thereof "16."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask now to return to section 12. I have two amendments to submit to the section.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have an amendment to this section if it is time for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] to offer his first amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Clerk has the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] if his amendment was printed the other day in the RECORD?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it was not. As I understand it, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is offering an amendment to section 12, but I was offering an amendment to the section just read—the last section.

The SPEAKER. Where is the amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is on page 18.

The SPEAKER. But where is the physical property of the amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I sent it up to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. This amendment is to the section just read, which is now section 16?

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

The SPEAKER. Yes, it is, because the Chair put that amendment and it was carried. Nobody objected to it. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 9, strike out all after the word "vessel" and all of lines 10, 11, and 12 and insert:

"That all treaties of the United States with foreign nations, in so far as they require the arrest, or detention, or return to his ship of any American sailor for desertion, are hereby abrogated."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that this amendment really applies to section 15 and not to section 16.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know what section it applies to, but I have read both of them. I gave the line and the page. That is the reason why I interrupted the reading.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the provision that the gentleman seeks to amend is on page 18, lines 10, 11, and 12.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This section was not read before.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; it was read the other day.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If that is true, I offer the amendment, then, to the other section.

The SPEAKER. Where does the gentleman want it to come in?

Mr. MANN. It was passed over before.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was passed over before, and it would be inserted on page 18, line 9, striking out all of line 9 after the word "vessel" and all of lines 10, 11, and 12 of page 18 and inserting that amendment. I desire to be heard on it just a moment, Mr. Speaker, in order to explain what is meant by it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order—the section already having been considered?

The SPEAKER. It can not be done except by unanimous consent. By unanimous consent it can be done.

Mr. MANN. The sections were passed over the other day.

The SPEAKER. The understanding of the Chair was that it had been passed over.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was read the other day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 18, line 9, by striking out all after the word "vessel" and all of lines 10, 11, and 12, and inserting: "That all treaties of the United States with foreign nations, in so far as they require the arrest or detention or return to his ship of any American sailor for desertion, are hereby abrogated."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment to the next section, and I ask to offer it now, so that both of them may be considered at the same time. They cover the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] asks to have pending another amendment for the purpose of considering both it and the other one together. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 18, by striking out section 16 and inserting the following: "That the President of the United States is hereby requested to enter into negotiations with all foreign nations with whom we have treaties upon the subject looking to the abrogation of all provisions in such treaties for the arrest and punishment of seamen for desertion, and also negotiations with such nations looking to the formation of treaties between this country and such other countries to improve the condition of seamen and to produce greater security for life and property at sea, and to report the result of such negotiations to Congress at the earliest convenient time."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, Mr. Speaker, the bill as it stands abrogates a large number of treaties; in fact, treaties that we have with every commercial nation of the world; and it does it without any notice, without asking them to enter into any negotiations.

It vitally affects our commercial relations in a great many ways, and the sole purpose of it is to do away with what they call the "imprisonment" of the sailor—that is, to keep him from being returned to his ship for desertion.

Now, I am perfectly willing that that portion of the treaty so far as it applies to American sailors should be abrogated without notice to foreign countries. I think we have a perfect right to say what we shall do with our own sailors without consulting other countries. But for us to abrogate these various treaties that we have with commercial nations without giving them any notice does not seem to me to be such action as this body ought to take. Nor do I believe it will hasten the final time of this bill's becoming law. I am satisfied that the Senate will not pass a bill absolutely abrogating these various treaties without some notice being given to foreign nations. I am also satisfied that the Department of Commerce and Labor would not approve the legislation in this form, nor do I believe for one moment that the President of the United States upon a matter so small as the abolishing of imprisonment for desertion, which affects only foreign sailors, would sign the bill abrogating those treaties without notice. Now, if we are going to free the foreign sailor—and that is all this does—if we are going to make him free, why not at least consult the country that keeps him in bondage, and the country that he is willing to serve? I think we are making progress if we will take this plan and abrogate the treaties in so far as they affect American sailors, and then take up the negotiations with foreign countries in regard to their own sailors. That is all I have to say upon this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the provision in the bill is that—

All treaties in conflict with this act are hereby abrogated, and the President of the United States is required at once to so notify every nation having any such treaty.

I am not familiar with the form of the treaties. The matter that would be in conflict with this provision would be in a commercial or navigation treaty, would it not?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It would. We have commercial treaties with some 22 nations in which this question is involved.

Mr. MANN. Those treaties, I think, as a rule have provisions in reference to notice of abrogation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The time is usually one year. I do not know of any exception to that. But section 16 provides that this shall not go into effect until after the expiration of that notice, no matter how long notice may be required.

Mr. MANN. Where is that?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is in section 16:

That this act shall take effect, as to all vessels of the United States, 90 days after its passage, and as to foreign vessels 12 months after its passage, save and except that such parts hereof as provide for the abrogation of any stipulation by treaty or convention with any foreign nation shall only take effect after such notice, and at the expiration of such time as may be required by the terms of such treaty, stipulation, or convention.

Mr. MANN. I remember reading that, now. Does the gentleman think that absolutely covers the proposition?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think it does, and I see no reason why the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] should be agreed to under these circumstances.

Mr. MANN. I did not catch the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington. I was looking at the provisions of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If there are any provisions of this bill that are in conflict with any of our treaty obligations, then it becomes the duty of the President to give notice of the abrogation of the treaty, whether it applies to deserting seamen or to any other particular phase of the bill. Then the bill itself, as to that particular phase, does not go into effect until the expiration of the time required by the treaty for notice to be given to the foreign government.

Mr. MANN. I think probably that covers it, although it seems to me rather an inartificial way of getting at it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The last two amendments were offered to the original section 16. I think the committee amendment changing the number of the section was not agreed to. That does not amount to anything, as the Clerk will do it anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken. The gentleman happened to be engaged when the Chair put that amendment in this way: That if there was no objection the amendment changing the number of the section would be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. It would not make any difference anyway. I was only trying to identify it. Now, this section was passed over.

The SPEAKER. Section 12.

Mr. MANN. Section 15 was passed over the other day. Now, if we go back to section 12, does that dispose of section 15? In other words, if anybody has any other amendment, let him produce it now.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman has any amendment to section 15 let him offer it.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Or forever after hold his peace.

The SPEAKER. If not, we will return to section 12. The Clerk will read section 12.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That no vessel, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she has on board a crew not less than 75 per cent of which, in each department thereof, are able to understand any order given by the officers of such vessel, nor unless 40 per cent in the first year, 45 per cent in the second year, 50 per cent in the third year, 55 per cent in the fourth year after the passage of this act, and thereafter 65 per cent of her deck crew, exclusive of licensed officers, are of a rating not less than able seaman: Provided, That no vessel carrying passengers, except those navigating rivers and harbors exclusively, shall be permitted to depart from any port of the United States unless she shall have a sufficient crew to man each lifeboat with not less than two men of the rating of able seaman or higher.

No person shall be rated as an able seaman unless he is 19 years of age or upward and has had at least three years service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes. Any person may make application to any board of local inspectors for a certificate of service as able seaman, and upon proof being made to said board by affidavit, under rule approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, showing the nationality of the applicant and the vessel or vessels on which he has had service and that he has had at least three years service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes, the board of local inspectors shall issue to said applicant a certificate of service, which shall be retained by him and be accepted as prima facie evidence of his rating as an able seaman.

Each board of local inspectors shall keep a complete record of all certificates of service issued by them and to whom issued and shall keep on file the affidavits upon which said certificates are issued.

The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any citizen of the United States setting forth that this section is not being complied with, cause a muster of the crew of any vessel to be made to determine the fact; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel failing to comply with the provisions of this section.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 14, page 15, the words "who shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment provides that those who are charged with maintaining the lifeboats shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of the lifeboats under rules and regulations prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. It is not necessary to detain the House by discussing the merits of this amendment. The Titanic disaster developed that there were not sufficient men to man the lifeboats, and that they were wanting in skill. This amendment is to charge the officers of the vessel with the duty of drilling these men in the lowering and handling of lifeboats, so that they may be available when accidents occur.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 17, strike out the words "on deck," after the words "Great Lakes," and insert the following: "Or as a fisherman, and upon examination by the local inspector, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall direct, shall satisfy such inspector that he is competent to handle a lifeboat and other craft and equipment used for saving life at sea."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That amendment does not relate to the same part of the section as my amendment, and is not now in order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think that takes the place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. I want to be heard on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Which amendment does the gentleman wish to be heard upon?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On the substitute.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Missouri raises the point of order that the substitute is not germane, or that it does not appertain to the amendment offered by him.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He can offer his amendment after this is disposed of.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. As I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, it is exactly for the same purpose that I offer mine.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It relates to a different paragraph of the bill and is not inconsistent.

The SPEAKER. These two amendments have nothing on earth to do with each other. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri comes in at the end of line 14 and reads:

Add at the end of line 14, page 15, "who shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, to be approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor"— and the amendment of the gentleman from Washington comes in after the word "deck," in line 17:

Or as a fisherman, and upon examination by the local inspector, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall direct, etc.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "section," in line 14, page 16, add the following words: "Provided, That the collector of customs shall not be required to cause such muster of the crew to be made unless said sworn information has been filed with him for at least six hours before the vessel departs, or is scheduled to depart."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Missouri, in connection with this matter, whether he proposes to offer any amendment to the first part of that section, where it provides that the collector shall upon sworn information do certain things?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment printed in the RECORD and suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which I do not care to offer myself, but my amendment was to meet the criticism that it would place too much power in the hands of one individual to cause a muster of the crew, because he might do it for vexatious purposes and to delay the sailing of the vessel. My amendment provides that the collector shall have the discretion to order the muster, and he shall not be required to do it unless the affidavit is filed at least six hours before the vessel departs or is scheduled to depart.

Mr. MANN. I failed to get that part of it that gave him any discretion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, he has a discretion, unless the affidavit is made at least six hours before the vessel is scheduled to depart.

Mr. MANN. The first part of the paragraph provides:

The collector of customs may, upon his own motion, and shall, upon the sworn information of any citizen of the United States, etc.

If it should read:

May upon his own motion or upon the sworn information of any citizen of the United States—

That would leave him discretion, without anything further, and it seems to me would cover the case even better than the gentleman has covered it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That would give him discretion without limiting it as to time. The amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Missouri gives him discretion if the affidavit is not filed six hours prior to the sailing of the vessel, and my opinion is that six hours' time would be sufficient in which to muster the crew of the largest vessel that floats, so that by giving him discretion within those six hours no difficulty such as has been complained of would arise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am not a seaman, and I regret that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] nor the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] is not, and therefore better posted than probably any of us upon the subject; but it would seem to me that even on a six-hour permit it provides the easiest kind of blackmailing opportunity.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It does not seem so to me. In the first place, there are but two things to be found out as a result of the muster. One is as to whether or not the proper percentage of qualified seamen are there, and we have provided a means by which their qualifications can be determined almost on sight. The other is with regard to language.

Mr. MANN. Does it not require an examination of the papers in every case? How would one know whether a man is an able seaman unless you examine the certificate?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. We provide that the papers themselves shall be prima facie evidence.

Mr. MANN. But you have to examine the papers in each case.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true, but it does not take long, as the gentleman knows, to examine the papers that state that a seaman has certain qualifications, unless you attempt to go behind the returns and undertake to find out whether the papers have been properly issued.

Mr. MANN. Well, take my part of the country. He files an affidavit with a collector of customs in the city of Chicago, and it would take him an hour or two hours to get down to South Chicago to get in touch with the vessel at all; and if he had to go to Michigan City it would take him more than six hours to go to Michigan City. Michigan City is controlled by the collector of customs at the port of Chicago, and the same condition is true all over the coast of the United States. How would you be able to do it? All you could do in the last instance would be to send a telegram demanding that the vessel be held. It would be the easiest thing in the world to blackmail.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In the general run of cases six hours is ample time.

Mr. MANN. That might be true in the general run of cases.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment. I want to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill if he will not accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]? He is not here; there are several gentlemen who are vitally interested in this bill, who, not knowing that it was going to come up to-day, are not here this afternoon. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has pointed out, to leave this section the way it is would absolutely place it within the power of any one citizen to hold up every ship in any port in the United States. With as few members as there are here present now I do not think we ought to undertake to pass such drastic legislation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, and I presume the chairman of the committee has the same opinion, I would not agree to that amendment. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee gives protection of six hours' time, in which the collector of the port has discretion. If you strike out the words "and shall" and insert the word "or" in the case, it gives to the collector discretion without qualification as to the time. Now, with regard to permitting any citizen of the United States by affidavit——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania (continuing). To furnish information of this kind——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Just a moment. I have no objection to the gentleman talking, but I hope he will get five minutes' additional time, because he is talking in my time now.

I want the gentleman to ask for five minutes when he gets through, because he has been consuming my time.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am simply replying to the gentleman's interrogatory, and if he does not desire a reply to the question I have no desire to impose myself either upon him or the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want the gentleman to ask for five minutes, so that I may have some time to talk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I do not decline to yield, of course not.

The SPEAKER. If nobody is going to argue the amendment the thing to do is to put the question.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am going to argue it when the gentleman gets through. I have yielded to him.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to make any remarks?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if the gentleman from Pennsylvania misunderstood me. I did not refuse to yield to him, my colleague on the committee; I would yield to him always. The only thing I suggested was that he was taking up my time with a statement, and I hoped that he would get some time for me. Waiting for six hours is of no advantage. I have talked to shipping men, and they tell me it would take from 6 to 24 hours to make a muster of the crew and go through the necessary examination. You put into the hands of any person, without any punishment, the power to compel absolutely a muster of the crew just as often as he wants to of every ship that comes into a port, and I repeat what I have said before, that if we do that we would put it in the power of any one man to tie up indefinitely all the shipping in any port in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I offer the following amendment, to come at the end of this section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 14, after the word "section," insert:
"Provided, That any person that shall knowingly make a false affidavit for such purpose shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or be punished not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, within the discretion of the Secretary."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That ought to go in after the amendment which has been agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thought the gentleman's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You say after the section, and that is where my amendment was inserted.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted it at the end.

Mr. HARDY. We have no objection to the penalty, but it seems to me that the law already provides a penalty against perjury, and I want to know whether the gentleman thinks he is adding anything to the law as it stands?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken; I have looked into that, and there is no law on the statute books that makes a false affidavit a perjury.

Mr. HARDY. We have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Washington to the fact that evidently there is a clerical error toward the last of his amendment. It says "or be punished not exceeding one year." Of course it ought to be "imprisonment."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks leave to change the phraseology of his amendment by striking out the words "be punished" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "by imprisonment."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the latter part of his amendment, where, I think, it is wrong, if the Clerk will read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Of course the "in the discretion of the Secretary" should be "in the discretion of the court."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not look at the amendment after I dictated it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "Secretary" and insert the word "court."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the word "Secretary" will be changed to the word "court."

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer as an amendment, on page 15, to strike out all after the word "crew," in line 1, and the whole of lines 2 and 3, down to and including the word "vessel," in line 4.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 15 by striking out all after the word "crew" in line 1, the whole of lines 2 and 3 and line 4 up to the word "nor."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the purpose of that amendment is to strike out the language test. I would like very much for the gentlemen who are present to understand the situation in regard to this matter.

The bill as it stands proposes that all vessels that come into American ports, not only American vessels, but all vessels that come into American ports, shall carry a certain percentage of their crew in all departments that can understand any order of their officers. Now, the purpose of that amendment is well understood by everyone who has had anything to do with this bill. It is to do away with Chinese crews upon various vessels, a consummation devoutly to be wished. There is no patriotic American but would like to see that accomplished, and I do not believe that there is anyone who has given the question study but that thinks it ought to be done if it can be done.

But I want to call attention to the situation as it is upon the Pacific in particular as to what the result of this amendment will be. I want to quote just a sentence or two from the hearings—a statement made by the distinguished chairman of the committee when Mr. Schwerin, of San Francisco, was before it. The chairman said:

As I understand you, you suspect that this language is inserted here for the purpose of excluding Chinese crews from the ships?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if it does, I am opposed to it, because I quite agree with you that under existing conditions it is proper to use Chinese crews.

Mr. SCHWERIN. That is what is aimed at here, and it has been openly stated so by many labor leaders, and I know it.

Then I asked Mr. Schwerin what would be the result. He replied:

Mr. SCHWERIN. The Americans would lose five ships under their flag—that is all—and American officers their jobs.

I want to call your attention to the fact as to why the distinguished chairman, I am satisfied, made that statement, and why I agree with him in regard to it. You take it upon the Pacific Ocean to-day, and there is one line of American vessels running from San Francisco to the Orient, namely, the Pacific Mail. That line runs in direct competition with a Japanese line that is subsidized $100,000 in gold for each round trip for each ship. Now, do not forget that. The Japanese vessels employ oriental cheap crews. The Pacific Mail employs the same character of crews. If this bill goes into effect in regard to the language test, the American vessel will have to have English-speaking crews, which will add about $100,000 expense to each round trip, making a difference, considering the subsidy, between the Japanese and American ships of $200,000 for each round trip. It is not necessary for me to stop and argue what will be the result. The result will be exactly as Mr. Schwerin says: "The Americans will lose five ships under their flag." They will immediately take the Japanese flag. That will be the only result. And at once, instead of having the American ships and Chinese crews, we will have Japanese ships with Japanese crews. Now, that is the condition at San Francisco. Up at Seattle there are two lines of Japanese vessels which run out of that port. They are subsidized, but they are slower ships. They are subsidized about $25,000 on one line for each round trip for each ship and about $50,000 in gold for each vessel for a round trip on the other line. From Seattle still runs one American ship, the only ship engaged exclusively in the over-seas trade under the American flag which is to-day running without a subsidy. Now, if you make the change, the result will be that vessel—the Minnesota—will have to employ English-speaking crews, against oriental-speaking crews upon the Japanese vessel. The result will be the Japanese flag will at once fly on that great American ship.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask for 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentlemen of the House to a further point. I have been trying to find some way, and I have sought earnestly and honestly to see if there was any way in which this bill could be supported and not absolutely destroy American shipping on the Pacific coast. If so, I was willing to vote for it. But it will only destroy American shipping and not benefit a single American sailor or a single American ship upon the Pacific Ocean. Then, why should we do it?

There is not a single American sailor, so far as I know—perhaps there may be a few, but I doubt if there is a single American sailor—upon the Pacific Ocean, upon any of these lines, that would be affected. Now, I want you to understand that when you are making this change you are not making it for the benefit of American sailors. You are proposing to put these vessels under the Japanese flag, without benefiting anybody in this country. These ships will go under the Japanese flag, and continue to carry their oriental crews, but will lose their American officers.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield in just a moment. I want to finish with this point, and then I will yield to the gentleman. I want to call the attention of the House to the situation at Seattle and on Puget Sound, where it is a little more aggravated than it is at San Francisco, because at San Francisco the difference would be that you would have American vessels under the Japanese flag. But up at Seattle we have two English lines that run from Seattle to the Orient. We have two Japanese lines that run from Seattle to the Orient. We have one line that runs from South America up to Seattle, making four lines in all. Those English vessels employ Chinese crews. I am not sure about the German line, whether it employs a Chinese crew or not, but I think it does.

Now, suppose we should pass a law that would compel them to take off their Chinese crews. That would impose an expense for each round trip of at least $50,000. Right here, across the border [indicating on map], right at this point, in sight of Seattle, is Vancouver, British Columbia, a foreign port. The Canadian Pacific Railway has its terminus there. The Northern Pacific Railway has its terminals there. The Great Northern has its terminals there, and the Milwaukee is rapidly building to that port. Now, do you suppose that these foreign vessels coming from the Orient to Puget Sound are going to come down to Seattle or Tacoma, take chances on the desertion of their crews, and pay $50,000 for each voyage, when they can just as well stop at Vancouver, when there is not a single disadvantage in their so doing—not one? They have a good port there. They have spent millions of dollars to improve it. So that the only thing you will do by this bill will be to drive these vessels—all of them—from American ports to British ports. Instead of coming to Seattle they will go to Vancouver. What justification can there be for such legislation? The friends of this bill admit its main purpose is to induce foreign sailors to desert in American ports.

There is no doubt about it. No one who is in favor of this bill and studies it carefully will dispute that fact. That is the object of the bill. I am not going to argue whether that is a good proposition or a bad one. The friends of this bill argue that it is a good one because, they say, after a sailor deserts they will have to increase his wages to get him back on the vessel, and therefore it will raise the wages of sailors all over the world, and that will be a good thing. I doubt whether this will be the result when they come to the crews of vessels flying the English, German, or Japanese flag.

But however that may be, is the Japanese vessel going to come down to Seattle, where crews will be induced to desert? Men favoring this bill say that the Japanese sailors are learning to desert. Is the Japanese vessel going to come down to where its crew will desert, where they will be subject to the restrictions that this bill proposes in regard to the character of the crew and in other respects, when they can just as well stop at Vancouver? I want the Members from the Pacific coast to understand the situation and to know when they vote for this bill that, if it goes on the statute books, in six months' time there will not be an American flag on the Pacific Ocean in the deep-sea trade. If it goes on the statute books, so far as Seattle and Tacoma are concerned, with reference to the foreign trade, they might as well be blotted from the map.

You will absolutely destroy those cities as foreign ports, and I want the gentlemen here, especially those from the Pacific coast, to know it when they vote, so that they can not plead that they did not understand the result that was going to follow.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Speaking of these Japanese lines from San Francisco to the Orient, is it not a fact that they have Chinese crews to the extent of at least 75 per cent?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washingon. No, sir; it is not a fact.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that the Japanese vessels that sail from Seattle have at least 75 per cent Chinese crews?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No, sir; it is not a fact.

Mr. RAKER. What proportion?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. A very small proportion of the crews upon Japanese vessels are Chinamen. There are a few in the steward's department. To make absolutely sure that I was not mistaken about that matter I asked the president of the sailors' union not two hours ago, and he assured me that there are only a few Chinese employed in the steward's department. Most of the crew upon Japanese vessels are Japanese. They employ their own people.

There is just one other point that I want to call attention to generally on this language-test proposition. The bill not only prescribes what kind of crews foreign vessels shall have and what language they shall speak on Japanese and other vessels, but under this bill an English vessel is prohibited from employing British subjects in many cases, because there are a great many British subjects who are sailors who do not speak the English language.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that under the present arrangement between the United States and Japan these Japanese could not desert and keep in line with the treaty agreement or the gentleman's agreement; that by deserting they would come into the United States and violate the very treaty or gentleman's agreement I was talking about in regard to the Japanese?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On the contrary, I will quote the authority that I referred to awhile ago, that I think is the highest authority there is on this question. I quote the distinguished president of the sailors' union. He says that the Japanese will desert. He thinks that thereby he will be enabled to increase wages at all Pacific ports.

I think there is no question that they will desert. This bill leaves it wide open anywhere in the United States for any sailor to come in, leave his vessel, and evade our immigration laws. That is one of the beauties of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks a Japanese sailor who had made a contract to serve for a certain length of time would be restrained by a gentleman's agreement between nations, not to desert if he was going to break his contract.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I should not think so. I should think any sailor who would enter into a solemn agreement with the owner of a vessel to serve for a round trip, and then desert, would not be restrained by a gentleman's agreement or any other kind.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman elaborate the point that higher wages will follow the desertions?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have never been able to follow that argument exactly. I will try to state it as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to answer the gentleman's question. This is the vital part of the whole bill.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The theory upon which this bill has been drawn, as I understand it, is this: I will take an exact illustration. A vessel comes into Seattle from Japan. It has a Japanese crew. That crew deserts when it gets into the port of Seattle. Under this bill there is no authority to take those men back to their vessel. They can leave it at will. Now, their theory is that the crew will not go back until they have agreed to increase their wages. It might work in some places, but it will not work in Seattle, where they can stop at Vancouver. No Japanese shipowner is going to be so negligent of his own interest as to come down to Seattle when it would be of no advantage to him and might cause him endless trouble and great expense.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will not either Chinese or Japanese vessels——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that this discussion is not on the question before the House; it is the language test.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will not both Chinese and Japanese sailors be taken up by the authorities and deported?

Mr. RAKER. You can not deport the Japanese laborers.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. You can deport the Chinese.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will tell you, gentlemen, that as far as the Pacific Ocean is concerned, this bill is in every way in favor of the Japanese. Japan will control the entire trade in that ocean with the United States within six months after this law goes upon the statute books. If it in any way favored the American sailor or the American shipowner I would be in favor of it, but I am opposed and shall not vote knowingly to turn the Pacific Ocean over to Japan.

Mr. RAKER. If the same law applied to the Japanese that now applies to the Chinese there would be no objection raised; the objection now raised by the gentleman from Washington would not apply, would it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, if conditions were different, the same result might not happen.

Mr. RAKER. If the Japanese laborers were prevented from entering into the United States, the question of their desertion would not be an objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; the question of the desertion would not be, but you would turn the whole matter over to the Japanese, as far as the ship is concerned, in any event.

Mr. RAKER. What is the difference between a Japanese vessel having a Japanese crew and an American vessel having Japanese and Chinese crews registered under the American flag?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The difference is twofold. You have American officers and pay them high wages on American ships; you would replace them with Japanese. If the time should come when we had difficulty and need of transports, these vessels of the Pacific Mail Co. are suitable for that purpose, and they are the only vessels under the American flag except one on the Pacific Ocean that are.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Are not two-thirds of the Japanese vessels manned by American captains?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; that was true a few years ago, but it is not true now.

Mr. RAKER. How long since it ceased?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not until recently.

Mr. RAKER. Very recently, indeed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; within two or three years.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the wool bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the wool bill in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, in less than five minutes I think I can do away with the argument of the gentleman from Washington. This bill will drive no ship from the sea under the language test. The gentleman speaks of Mr. Schwerin, who testified before our committee that nearly every Chinaman he had could comply with the requirements of this bill, for the reason that he understood every order naturally to be given on board ship.

The English law requires that 70 per cent of their crew shall understand the language of the officers. The Swedish law is more strenuous still, and to show how little there is in what the gentleman from Washington has been saying, Mr. Hibberd, representing the Pacific coast interests, appeared before our committee, and this statement appears in the hearings:

Mr. HARDY. Do you thinks it is safe for a ship to be navigated unless 75 per cent of the crew understand the orders—it need not be English, but they can not understand? Mr. Parine said that among his sailors, Chinese though they were, every one of them understood orders such as were given.

Mr. HIBBERD. We never carry Chinese crews, so I can not answer that.

Mr. HARDY. The thing there is that they ought to have enough knowledge of English for a member of the crew to understand when he is spoken to and do what he is told to do.

Mr. HIBBERD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Then, if 75 per cent of them understand you can trust nearly all of them, and I think that the English law requires that 75 per cent can speak the English language.

The CHAIRMAN. We did not put that in for the reason that we did not want to prohibit against Germans, Swedes, Chinamen, nor Japanese, but simply that he understands the orders of the master when given in Chinese, Japanese, Hindu, or in a sign language—he ought to understand the orders.

Mr. HIBBERD. That does not interest the men on the coast very much.

Mr. Hibberd, representing that interest, said that it did not concern the men on the coast very much; and it is a fact that each and every one of them said that the provision would not interfere with their sailing or their vessels. The truth is, Mr. Schwerin said his Japanese sailors understood all of the orders perfectly, and that not 75 per cent but that 100 per cent of them understood the orders.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the Clerk report the first amendment that appears in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "States," in line 10, page 2, amend by inserting the words "navigating the ocean and the Great Lakes and on voyages of more than 12 hours' length."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, where does that amendment come in? Is that an amendment to section 1 of the bill? Is that something that has been passed over?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of offering that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to page 2, section 1, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's objection comes too late.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman up trying to object before the Chair announced the decision?

Mr. BULKLEY. I was.

The SPEAKER. Very well. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman's purpose is in denying unanimous consent, but if he is trying in that way to make time, he is mistaken in his attitude in regard to it, for if he insists upon it I shall make the point of no quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I merely said that I did not understand the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio in making his objection, and of course I have not the right to ask him, and do not ask him.

Mr. BULKLEY. But I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman. I object because I do not like the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suppose the gentleman does not want it to apply to the Great Lakes?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I want it to apply to the Great Lakes, and I think it does as it reads now; but I object to the 12-hour part of it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. When the amendment is pending, why not move to strike out that part of it at that time?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not want the 12-hour part of it in at all. If the gentleman will assure me that he will cut that out, I will give unanimous consent to return to the paragraph.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman wants to move to strike that out, I shall not force it. It was put in at the suggestion of other parties.

Mr. BULKLEY. I would rather not give consent unless that is understood.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his objection?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I object.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman who is in charge of the bill a question. On page 14, section 12, line 24, we find this language:

Except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act.

I do not know what is meant by the statement "section 1 of this act."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, section 1 of this act provides for the amendment of section 4516, and requires that the master must ship, if obtainable, a number equal to the number of those whose services he has been deprived of, and the clause to which the gentleman has reference——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That refers to ships, but the language is:

That no vessel, except those navigating the rivers exclusively, and except as provided in section 1 of this act.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On page 14, lines 23, 24, and 25. I never have been able to understand what that language means.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That applies to section 1. Section 12 says that no vessels, except those navigating rivers exclusively and except as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be permitted to depart from any port, and so forth. Section 1 of the act provides that he must secure certain seamen when desertions take place, if obtainable, so that if they are not obtainable he would still be permitted to depart, and that is what that language applies to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is what it is intended to apply to.

Mr. HARDY. It is intended to apply to the unalterable requirements in section 1 that exempt the vessels which could not get a crew the other way.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has an amendment to offer, but he is not here. I am willing to go through the discussion of this bill to-day, but if the gentleman is going to insist upon a vote upon it without giving the gentleman from Pennsylvania an opportunity to be heard, I do not like to do it. The gentleman has been very courteous, but I do not think he ought to try to pass the bill——

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are going to pass the bill to-day, and if the gentleman wants to offer the amendment in the absence of Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, I will not object and will not resist his amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know what it is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. At the same time, the gentleman wants us to delay the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill as amended to final passage——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have an amendment pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 17, strike out the words "on deck," and after the words "Great Lakes" insert the following: "Or as a fisherman, and upon examination by the local inspector, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall direct, shall satisfy such inspector that he is competent to handle a lifeboat and other crafts and equipment used for saving life at sea."

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on that amendment. Especially to vessels on the Great Lakes and on inland waters this is very important. I call to the attention of the House that the bill provides that every ship shall have two able seamen for each lifeboat. Under the regulations made recently the number of lifeboats in some instances has been more than doubled. Now, if we adopt this amendment which I have offered, it makes any man who has been drilled and is capable of handling a lifeboat an able seaman. If you do not do this, you increase, in some instances, three times the number of men upon the deck for no purpose whatever except to be used in time of accident. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact, as I said the other day, in regard to able seamen, that many men have been upon the Great Lakes and upon the ocean on deck for three years and more and yet know nothing whatever about handling a lifeboat, have never handled a rowboat, and know no more about them than if they had been spending their time in this House. Now, this proposes to make a definition of able seaman that will mean something, so when we put men on a lifeboat they shall know something about it. By striking out the words "on deck," then it includes both firemen and those in the steward's department. The fireman and those in the steward's department know as much about handling the lifeboats as the so-called able seaman.

They all get exactly the same training. If you adopt this amendment, when a man makes an application for a position upon a vessel he will have to know something about handling a lifeboat. I have not been able to understand how any man on either side of this House can object to this amendment in view of the fact that we have been saying that we want to increase the safety of life at sea. If you want to do that, let us put the right kind of men in the lifeboats. This will not work a hardship on anybody unless on the shipowner. I hope there will be no opposition to this amendment on either side of the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's purpose is not alone to provide that skilled seamen shall be used in lowering the lifeboats. The amendment agreed to awhile ago expressly provides that the men used in lowering lifeboats shall be drilled in the handling and lowering of lifeboats under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

And the very purpose of that amendment was to provide that vessels shall not depart from any port of the United States unless they shall have a sufficient crew with which to man each lifeboat, and that they shall be drilled in lowering and managing lifeboats. And that amendment has been already agreed to. The gentleman's purpose is to qualify the provision with reference to able seamen. He is opposed to that provision in the bill, and hence his amendment provides:

Strike out the words "on deck," and after the words "Great Lakes," insert the following:

"Or as a fisherman, and upon examination by the local inspector, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Navigation, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall direct, shall satisfy such inspector that he is competent to handle a lifeboat and other crafts and equipment used in saving life."

Now, the effect of this amendment will be to nullify the other amendment which has been agreed to, that not less than two of these seamen shall be able seamen and qualified to lower lifeboats. In other words, the purpose is to permit the ship's officers to use stewards, waiters, or anybody else on board for this purpose, provided they are drilled in that work. Our object in framing this section is to provide that the deck crew shall be able seamen, and at least two able seamen to each lifeboat, and that all those who man lifeboats shall be qualified to handle them.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The language of the bill to which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] offers his amendment is:

No person shall be rated as an able seaman unless he is 19 years of age or upward, and has had at least three years' service on deck at sea or on the Great Lakes.

Does that expression "on deck" include fishermen's boats?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do not think there is any question but that it does.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think it does.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think there is not any question but that a fisherman, when he is at sea, is on deck.

Mr. MANN. Having heard the opinion of my seaman friend from Pennsylvania, I would like also the opinion of my seaman friend from Missouri, whether he thinks service on deck will include service on fishermen's boats?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know why it would not.

Mr. MANN. That is not my question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The best seaman we have is the fisherman.

Mr. MANN. Is this service on deck? I want it, so it, at least, will go in the RECORD.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do not want it so that those in the steward's department, the waiters, and the chambermaids, and so forth, shall man the ship. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is talking about the paragraph that is not under consideration. I am talking about the one that is, namely, the definition of what an able seaman is. Let us have no misunderstanding about it. If it does not include men doing work on fishermen's boats, it ought to do so, and if it does, let us say so.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If there is any question about it, we would have no objection to the words "fishermen at sea or on the Great Lakes" being included, but to take the rest of the gentleman's amendment would be another proposition.

Mr. MANN. I am supposed to be talking about the gentleman's amendment. Do the gentlemen in charge of the bill have any doubt that it does include service on fishing boats?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt but that it includes fishermen, but if there are any gentlemen on the floor who have any doubt as to its including fishermen I, for one, have no objection to an amendment being offered that will include fishermen on the seas and on the Great Lakes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 126. Joint resolution authorizing Federal bureaus doing hygienio and demographic work to participate in the exhibition to be held in connection with the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 126. Joint resolution authorizing Federal bureaus doing hygienic and demographic work to participate in the exhibition to be held in connection with the Fifteenth International Congress on Hygiene and Demography; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claims of American citizens for damages suffered within American territory and growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to send to the Clerk's desk and have read the House joint resolution that I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 346.

Whereas, by an error in printing the report of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 21230, approved June 19, 1912 (Private, No. 26), the designation of the military service of one Thomas Davidson, late of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read "Company H" of said regiment: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in H. R. 21230, approved June 19, 1912 (Private, No. 26), granting an increase of pension to one Thomas Davidson be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Thomas Davidson, late of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 a month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the consideration of this resolution and consider it now. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will suggest that in passing the resolution the reference should be made to the law, not to the bill, both in the title and body of the resolution. The gentleman should put in the title of the law. That is what we want to correct. We do not want to correct the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The title to the law is in the resolution. I copied the title of the law in the resolution. I did not refer to the number of the omnibus bill, but referred to the number of the act—Private, 26.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the title of the law be inserted in the body of this resolution and in its title. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution as amended.

The House joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCE OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a very interesting address delivered by Mr. O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, on the commerce of the Mississippi Valley.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech on the commerce of the Mississippi Valley delivered by Mr. O. P. Austin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SURVIVORS OF THE ANDREWS RAID.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and before the Chair submits that request I wish to make a very brief statement.

On the 21st of December, 1911, I introduced a bill (H. R. 16639) granting pensions to William Bensinger, William J. Knight, Wilson W. Brown, John R. Porter, and Daniel A. Dorsey, five of them in all, being the survivors of the famous Andrews raid. This bill is pending in the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I earnestly hope it may receive early consideration and favorable report at the hands of the committee. I suppose every gentleman in the House knows the story of that heroic exploit, unexcelled for bravery and daring in the bloody annals of war.

The cool deliberation of their leader, the carefully wrought plan, the noble patriotic devotion of the heroic men who risked and some of whom lost their lives in executing that plan, the capture of that famous old engine "The General," the mad race for life, the fruitless attempt to destroy track and bridge so as to block pursuit, the final abandonment of "The General" by the raiders, their pursuit and capture by the Confederate forces—all these make a thrilling story of dash and excitement and courage without a parallel in history.

Of the 22 men in this expedition, 20 were furnished by Ohio, most of them coming from the Twenty-first, Second, and Thirty-third Regiments. Many of these men I have known well, some of them, I am proud to say, intimately. They were a heroic band, the story of whose courage and fortitude stirs the heart of every American. Of the 22 men who thus contributed one of the most brilliant pages in our country's history, only five remain; four of them are residents of Ohio, one lives in Illinois, but wherever they may abide, the story of their heroism will continue to inspire the youth of the land, and when the last of the five shall have answered the final roll call and gone to meet his comrades on "fame's eternal camping ground" the Andrews Raiders will be remembered, and I trust that a grateful Nation may not have to regret that it failed to provide for these old heroes in their declining years.

In connection with House bill 16639 and the story of the Andrews or Mitchell raid, as it is sometimes called, a very interesting account recently appeared in the Pittsburgh Gazette-Times, and I ask unanimous consent to print this account in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. The bill and the newspaper article to which I have referred are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16639) granting a pension to William Bensinger and others.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $100 per month, the names of William Bensinger, Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; William J. Knight, Company K, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Wilson W. Brown, Company F, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; John R. Porter, Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry; and Daniel A. Dorsey, Company H, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, the pension herein provided to be in lieu of any and all pensions now received by said soldiers, whether under the general law or by special act of Congress.

[From the Pittsburgh Gazette-Times, Jan. 14, 1912.]

EXPLOIT OF THE ANDREWS RAIDERS REVIVED—CONGRESSMAN'S APPLICATION TO GIVE SPECIAL PENSIONS TO THE FIVE SURVIVORS OF THAT WILD RIDE ON "THE GENERAL," A LOCOMOTIVE THE RAIDERS STOLE FROM THE CONFEDERATES, RENEWS INTEREST IN ONE OF THE MOST DARING INCIDENTS OF THE CIVIL WAR—20 OF THE MEN FROM OHIO.

One of the most daring exploits of the Civil War was recalled a few days since by the publication in the Gazette-Times of the following dispatch from Findlay, Ohio:

"Almost fifty years after they had pierced the Confederate lines near Chattanooga and stole a locomotive in the heart of the Confederacy the five survivors of the Andrews raiders will be granted a special pension of $100 a month, if a bill introduced by Congressman WILLIS, of this district, becomes a law. The survivors are William Bensinger, 72, of McComb, this county; W. J. Knight, Strycker, Ohio; W. W. Brown, 74, East Toledo; D. A. Dorsey, 76, Lincoln, Nebr.; and John R. Porter, residing in Illinois."

The story of the Andrews raiders and their bold seizure of "The General," the locomotive destined to become famous (it now occupies a post of honor in the Union Station at Chattanooga), will bear telling again. Grayheads there be who will yet thrill at its recital, and there may be many younger persons to whom it will come as interesting information. The narrative is most interestingly set forth in an attractive brochure issued some months ago at Nashville. Here it is:

BEGINNING OF THE ADVENTURE.

When, on a bright April day in 1862, the trainman sang out, "Big Shanty: 20 minutes for breakfast," the hearts of a score of brave men beat faster, as they knew the hour had come for the beginning of one of the grandest exploits in history.

The men, from their dress, were citizens, and had boarded the northbound train at Marietta, a pretty little Georgia town 20 miles north of Atlanta. They paid their fares to different points, and from the conversation one would suppose that they were refugees from the Yankees; but in reality they were disguised soldiers of the United States Army under command of Gen. Mitchell, then in middle Tennessee, bound south.

They were volunteers to do a dangerous work, and were to get through the country as best they could to Marietta, then board a train bound for Chattanooga, and at Big Shanty, 7 miles away, while the crew and passengers were at breakfast, detach the engine, run north, obstruct the track, cut the wires, and burn bridges, of which there were 15 between Big Shanty and Chattanooga. This was the brilliant scheme. How well it was carried out is here shown:

STRANGERS BOARD TRAIN.

On the morning of the 12th of April, 1862, Capt. W. A. Fuller left Atlanta at 6 o'clock in charge of the passenger train, having three empty freight cars next to the engine, which were intended to bring commissary stores from Chattanooga to Atlanta. When he reached Marietta, 20 miles distant from Atlanta, a considerable party of strangers, dressed in citizens' clothes, got on board and paid their fares, some to one point and some to another. They all claimed to be refugees from within the Yankee lines desirous of joining the Confederate army.

Seven miles from Marietta, at Big Shanty, the train stopped for breakfast. Most of the passengers and train's crew went to the breakfast house, which was situated some 40 feet from the track. At this time Big Shanty was the location of a camp of instruction, called Camp McDonald, and there were about 3,000 Confederate recruits there at the time, being drilled ready to send to the front for active service. The passengers had taken seats at the table. Capt. Fuller was sitting on the opposite side of the table from the railroad, and facing the train. He saw through the window some of the strangers who got on at Marietta get on the engine in an excited manner and start off rapidly, with the three freight cars detached from the passenger train. He remarked to his engineer, Jeff Cain, and to Anthony Murphy, who was present, and at that time foreman of the Western & Atlantic Railroad shops: "Some one has gone off with our train." All three arose and hurried out of the house just as the engine passed out of sight.

NOT DREAMED THEY WERE FEDERALS.

Some deserters had been reported as having left Camp McDonald, and the commanding officer had requested Capt. Fuller to look out for them and arrest any soldier who attempted to get on his train without a passport. No one had any idea that the parties in possession of the engine were Federals, but supposed that it had been taken by parties desiring to desert Camp McDonald, and who would run off a short distance and abandon it.

Capt. Fuller, Murphy, and Cain left Big Shanty with a clear and well-defined motive and a fixed determination to recapture the engine, no matter who the parties were. They started out on foot and alone, nothing daunted in putting muscle in competition with steam. Capt. Fuller outran his companions and soon reached Moon's Station, two miles from Big Shanty. Here he learned from the trackmen that the men with the engine stopped and took their tools from them by force. They reported that on the engine and in the freight cars there were 24 or 25 men, and that while some of the men gathered the tools, others climbed the telegraph poles and cut the wires in two places, carrying away about 100 yards of wire. This statement satisfied Capt. Fuller that these men were Federals in disguise. This added new stimulus to his resolve. The determination then was not only to capture his engine, but the Federals.

PURSUIT IN HAND CAR.

With the assistance of the track hands he placed on the track a hand car and pushed back for his engineer, when he soon met Messrs. Murphy and Cain.

Knowing the schedules, grades, stations, and distances so well, he was confident that by using great effort he could reach Etowah River by the time the fugitives could reach Kingston. At Kingston he knew they would have to contend with a number of freight trains, which would necessarily detain them several minutes.

As soon as he got Mr. Murphy and Mr. Cain on board he told them his plan to push on to Etowah as quickly as possible, for there he hoped to get old "Yonah," an engine used at Cooper's iron works; and his plan proved successful. In the "rapid transit" by hand car Capt. Fuller, Mr. Murphy, and Mr. Cain took turns in pushing, two running on foot and pushing, while the other rested; one mile from Moon Station they found a large pile of crossties on the track—placed there by the fugitives to obstruct pursuit. The obstructions were removed, and they pushed on to Acworth.

Here they pressed into service such guns as they could find and were joined by two citizens—Mr. Smith, of Jonesboro, and Steve Stokely, of Cobb County—who rendered valuable service in the subsequent pursuit. Resuming their journey they found no obstruction until they reached a short curve 2 miles from Etowah. Here two rails from the outside of the curve had been taken up.

The result was the hand car was ditched. In a few seconds Capt. Fuller and his men had the car on the track beyond the break, and with renewed energy and determination they pushed on to Etowah, where, to their great joy, they found the engine, as they supposed they would. And yet it appeared a slim chance. The engine was standing on the sidetrack, with the tender on the turn table. The tender was turned around and pushed to the engine and a coal car attached. Some six or eight Confederate soldiers volunteered in the chase and took passage in the coal car.

RAN 60 MILES AN HOUR.

From Etowah to Kingston Capt. Fuller ran at the rate of 60 miles an hour, and found that the fugitives had passed by. A large number of freight trains had pulled by the station so as to let the fugitives out at the farther end of the track.

The agent informed Capt. Fuller that the leader of the fugitives claimed to be a Confederate officer who had impressed the train at Big Shanty, and the three cars were loaded with fixed ammunition for Gen. Beauregard, at Corinth. Capt. Fuller, he said, was behind with the regular passenger train. He insisted that the agent should let him have a switch key and instruct the conductors of the down trains to pull by and get out of his way, as it was important for him to go on to Chattanooga and Corinth as rapidly as possible.

So authoritative was he in his demands, and so plausible in his speech, that the agent, a patriotic man, believing his story, carried out his request, and so the fugitives, by the finesse of their leader, passed by one great obstruction. The freight trains were gathered here, and so heavy to move that had Capt. Fuller stopped to get them out of his way, to pass, his delay would have been too long. Finding that he could not pass with old "Yonah," he abandoned it.

The Rome engine was on the "Y," headed for Chattanooga, with one car attached. He immediately took possession of it, and continued the chase with all who would volunteer to go with him. He had not proceeded far before he found crossties on the track every 200 or 300 yards.

DROPPED TIES FROM REAR.

After passing Kingston the fugitives punched out the end of the rear car, which enabled them to drop out ties without slacking up. Capt. Fuller was forced to lose time in stopping to remove these obstructions.

Laboring under these disadvantages, the pursuers redoubled their energy and proceeded to Adairsville. When he reached a point 4 miles from Adairsville he found 60 yards of track torn up, and set out on foot, calling on his men to follow. When he had gone half a mile he looked back and saw none but Anthony Murphy following him. He made 2 miles as quick as he could run, and met the express freight. Having a gun and knowing the signal, the engineer recognized Capt. Fuller and stopped the train immediately.

Knowing that Mr. Murphy was only a short distance behind, the train was detained until he came up. He then took a position at the rear end of the train, 20 car lengths from the engine, and started backward, in the direction of Adairsville, without taking time to explain to the engineer or conductor. When he got within 200 yards of the switch at Adairsville, Capt. Fuller jumped off the train, ran ahead, and changed the switch so as to throw the cars on the sidetrack.

He accomplished this, changed the switch to the main track, and jumped on the engine, which had been uncoupled from the train. This feat was accomplished so quickly that the train and engine ran side by side for fully 300 yards. He now had only the engine with the following crew: A. Murphy, Peter Bracken, the engineer, Fleming Cox, the fireman, and Alonzo Martin, wood passer. He resumed the chase, making Calhoun, 10 miles distant, in 12 minutes. As he approached Calhoun, Capt. Fuller recognized the telegraph operator from Dalton, a lad 12 years old. The operator also recognized Capt. Fuller, and as the engine passed by, at the rate of 15 miles an hour, grasped Capt. Fuller's hand held out to him, and was safely landed on the engine.

NOTIFIES GEN. LEDBETTER.

The operator, having discovered that the wire had been cut, made his way down to Calhoun, looking for the break. As they sped along backward as fast as an engine with 5-foot 10-inch wheels could possibly run, Capt. Fuller wrote the following telegram to Gen. Ledbetter, then in command at Chattanooga:

"My train was captured this a. m. at Big Shanty, evidently by Federal soldiers in disguise. They are making rapidly for Chattanooga, possibly with an idea of burning the railroad bridges in their rear. If I do not capture them in the meantime, see that they do not pass Chattanooga."

Capt. Fuller's desire now was to reach Dalton and send the telegram before the fugitives could cut the wire beyond Dalton. Two miles beyond Calhoun the fugitives were sighted for the first time, and from their movements they were evidently greatly excited. They detached one of their freight cars and left it at the spot where they were discovered. They had partially taken up a rail, but that or the car did not detain Capt. Fuller.

He coupled the car to the engine without stopping, got on top of the freight car, and gave signals to the engineer by which he could run, as the car in front obscured his view. Two and a half miles farther Capt. Fuller came across another freight car which the fugitives had detached. As before, he coupled this on without stopping, and pushed on to Resaca, where he switched the two cars off on the siding.

JUMPS OVER RAILS.

Again he started with an engine only. Two miles north of Resaca, while standing on the rear of the tender, he discovered in a short curve a T rail diagonally across the track and being too close to stop, the engine went over it at the rate of 55 miles an hour. After this, until they reached Dalton, only occasionally were obstructions met with. At Dalton he dropped the telegraph operator with instructions to put through the telegram at all hazards, and continued the chase. Two miles beyond he overtook the fugitives tearing up the track in plain view of Col. Jesse A. Glenn's regiment, camped near by. They cut the telegraph wire just after the Dalton operator had flashed Capt. Fuller's telegraph over it, preventing him from receiving the usual acknowledgment from Chattanooga.

The fugitives resumed their flight, and never, perhaps, did two engines with 5 feet 10 inch wheels make faster time than the pursued and the pursuer. The fugitives had the advantage, from the fact that the "General," a "Rogers," was headed for Chattanooga, while the "Texas," a "Danforth & Cook" engine, was running backward.

The 15 miles to Ringgold and 3 miles beyond was made in less time than Capt. Fuller ever made the same distance in 22 years' experience as a conductor. Half way between Ringgold and Graysville he got within one-quarter of a mile of the fugitives, who, being so closely pressed, set their only remaining freight car on fire, with a view of cutting it loose on the next bridge. The smoke of the "General" plainly evidenced that she was fagging.

The fugitives abandoned the engine and took to the woods in a westerly direction. Capt. Fuller now ran up and coupled on to the burning car. The fire was extinguished and the car sent back to Ringgold in charge of the engineer. As Capt. Fuller passed Ringgold he noticed some 50 or 75 militia mustering, and sent back word to the commanding officer to put all his militia on horseback and send them into the woods in pursuit of the fugitives as quickly as possible.

This was about half past 1 o'clock p. m. Although jaded and fatigued, Capt. Fuller, Anthony Murphy, Fleming Cox, and Alonzo Martin took to the woods in pursuit. When the fugitives abandoned the engine, Andrews, their leader, said: "Everyone take care of himself," and they left in squads of three or four. Four of them were run down in the fork of the Chickamauga River at Graysville, and one was forcibly persuaded to tell who they were.

The militia, mounted on fresh horses, scoured the woods that afternoon, and in a few days the last of the fugitives were captured.

Later there was a trial by military court, and eight of the number were executed in Atlanta as spies. Six were exchanged and eight escaped from prison at Atlanta. Thus ended one of the most daring exploits on record.

There were 22 men engaged in the enterprise. Twenty of them were from Ohio and two from Kentucky.

THE MEN IN THE PARTY.

The following-named men participated in the famous raid:
James J. Andrews, leader, citizen of Flemingsburg, Ky.
William H. Campbell, citizen of Kentucky.
Marion A. Ross, sergeant major Second Ohio Infantry.
William Pittenger, sergeant, Company G, Second Ohio Infantry.
George D. Wilson, private, Company B, Second Ohio Infantry.
Charles P. Shadrach, private, Company K, Second Ohio Infantry.
Elihu H. Mason, sergeant, Company K, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
John M. Scott, sergeant, Company F, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
Wilson W. Brown, corporal, Company F, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
Mark Wood, private, Company C, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
John A. Wilson, private, Company C, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
William Knight, private, Company E, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
John R. Porter, private, Company G, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
William Bensinger, private, Company G, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
Robert Buffum, private, Company H, Twenty-first Ohio Infantry.
Martin J. Hawkins, corporal, Company A, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
William H. Reddick, corporal, Company B, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
Daniel A. Dorsey, corporal, Company H, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
John Wollam, private, Company C, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
Samuel Slavens, private, Company E, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
Samuel Robertson, private, Company G, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.
Jacob Parrott, private, Company K, Thirty-third Ohio Infantry.

Eight of these men, whose names appear below, were executed by the Confederate authorities at Atlanta, Ga., in June, 1862: Andrews on June 7; and Campbell Ross, George D. Wilson, Shadrach, Scott, Slavens, and Robertson on June 18. On October 16, 1862, the eight following-named made their escape from prison at Atlanta, Ga.: Brown, Wood, John A. Wilson, Knight, Porter, Hawkins, Dorsey, and Wollam. The remaining six members of the raiding party were paroled at City Point, Va., March 17, 1863. Their names follow: Pittenger, Mason, Bensinger, Buffum, Reddick, and Parrott.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, August 5, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 26112) to prescribe the method by which the terms of service shall be computed under the act of May 11, 1912, entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico"; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 26113) granting an appropriation for the destruction of predatory wild animals; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 26114) to authorize the people of Porto Rico to construct a bridge across the Cano de Martin Pena, an estuary of the harbor of San Juan, P. R.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TILSON: A bill (H. R. 26115) to provide for a uniform national bank currency; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Resolution (H. Res. 659) to pay Michael Doyle for services as a Capitol policeman; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. BROUSSARD: Resolution (H. Res. 660) authorizing the appointment of a committee to investigate the Mississippi River levees and defining its duties, etc.; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: Resolution (H. Res. 663) to make H. R. 22002 privileged; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 26116) granting an increase of pension to Adele Norton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 26117) authorizing the Secretary of War to confer upon David Davis the congressional medal of honor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 26118) granting an increase of pension to George M. Walton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 26119) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of George Osborn, alias George Allen; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 26120) granting a pension to Mary Jane Kuhns; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENSLEY: A bill (H. R. 26121) for the relief of Louis Burle, alias Ganter; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HOLLAND: A bill (H. R. 26122) for the relief of William Allman and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENDALL: A bill (H. R. 26123) granting a pension to Virginia A. Hunt; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PEPPER: A bill (H. R. 26124) for the relief of John Dennis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POST: A bill (H. R. 26125) granting a pension to Henrietta Gard; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS: A bill (H. R. 26126) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Joseph P. Leiter; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOWMAN: Petitions of H. E. Young, of Alden Station, and of Hanover Council, No. 251, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Sugar Notch, Pa., favoring passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. BUTLER: Memorial of Spring City Council, No. 900, Junior Order United American Mechanics, Spring City, Pa., and of Paoli Council, No. 500, Paoli, Pa., favoring passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: Petition of the Inventors' Guild, favoring commission to investigate need of change in patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

Also, petition of the National Association of Talking Machine Jobbers of Pittsburgh, Pa., against passage of House bill 22417, relative to change in patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. FULLER: Petition of the National Liberal Immigration League, favoring two battleships each year; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. HARTMAN: Petition of the American Opera House, Hopewell. Pa., favoring the passage of House bill 22527, for restriction of immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of the National Association of Talking Machine Jobbers of Pitttsburgh, Pa., against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in patent laws; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. LINDSAY: Memorial of the National Association of Talking Machine Jobbers of Pittsburgh, Pa., against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in the patent law; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. PARRAN: Petitions of George Bancroft Council, No. 571, and of Fourth Estate Council, No. 170, Order Independent Americans, favoring passage of House bill 25309, requiring the flag of the United States to be displayed on all lighthouses of the United States and insular possessions; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PALMER: Petition of citizens of Lansford, Pa., favoring passage of bills restricting immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of Bishop Rowe, of Alaska, favoring betterment of conditions of natives of Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. REILLY: Petition of the National Association of Talking Machine Jobbers of Pittsburgh, Pa., against passage of the Oldfield bill, proposing change in patent law; to the Committee on Patents.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 5, 1912.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4838) to amend section 96 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 7163) authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 22650. An act to amend sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 23673. An act to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen; and

H. J. Res. 346. Joint resolution to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 18642. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909; and

S. J. Res. 103. Joint resolution directing the Secretary of War to investigate the claims of American citizens for damages suffered within American territory and growing out of the late insurrection in Mexico.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—POST ROADS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, at the session on Friday night, while the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 21279) was under discussion, I had the privilege of submitting some remarks on the provision relating to good roads. In the course of my remarks I received the permission of the Senate to have a table inserted.

I find upon an examination of the RECORD that the table was inserted on pages 10809 and 10810, but appended to the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I am not particular as to who may receive the credit for the insertion of the table, my object in making this statement being that Senators may know to what page of the RECORD to refer in order to find the table. While I would prefer that the information collected by the department should have been credited to me, because I had the honor to submit it, and the Senator from Virginia, in view of the position he takes upon this question, might consider it as a liability rather than an asset to his argument, I have taken this opportunity to call the attention of Senators to the place in the RECORD where they can find the table.

OCCUPATION OF MEXICAN TERRITORY (S. DOC. NO. 896).

Mr. CATRON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a portion of Executive Document No. 60 of the Thirtieth Congress, first session, in 1848, being the part between pages 149 and 229. It has already been printed as a Senate document, but it is out of print.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator kindly state what the document relates to? What is the subject?

Mr. CATRON. It relates to the occupation of the Territory of New Mexico and the order which was made at that time by Gen. Kearney.

Mr. SMOOT. It is entitled "Occupation of Mexican Territory," message from the President of the United States upon the same.

Mr. CATRON. The part of the document that I wish to have reprinted relates entirely to New Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico asks that the part of the document the nature of which has been indicated by him may be reprinted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That Executive Document No. 60, "Occupation of Mexican Territory," message from the President of the United States, December 22, 1846, Executive Documents, first session Thirtieth Congress, pages 149 to 229, inclusive, be reprinted for the use of the Senate document room.

INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM (S. DOC. NO. 897).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have published as a public document an address delivered by Mr. Judson King, March 6, 1912, before the Political Science Club of the University of Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the subject?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a comparison of the "checks and balances" of the Constitution with the "safeguards and restrictions" proposed by the initiative and referendum. It is an excellent address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks that the address may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SANDERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 5135. An act for the relief of John J. Troxell (Rept. No. 1013); and

S. 4030. A bill for the relief of Sylvester W. Barnes (Rept. No. 1014).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7434) for the relief of Patrick Howe, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1015) thereon.

Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 7317) to provide increased quarantine facilities at the port of Portland, Me., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1016) thereon.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 5009) authorizing the President to appoint a commissioner to supervise the erection of monuments and markers and locate the general route of the Oregon trail, reported it with amendments.

JAMES S. BAER.

Mr. SANDERS. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 21952) for the relief of James S. Baer, and I submit a report (No. 1012) thereon. I ask for immediate action on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 21952) for the relief of James S. Baer. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21952) for the relief of James S. Baer.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James S. Baer, late captain Company G, First Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 28th day of September, 1864: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can an objection still be made to the consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair submitted the request to the Senate and consent was given for immediate consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just the title had been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to hear the report on the bill. I wish to know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report (No. 1012) this day submitted by Mr. SANDERS, as follows:

Mr. SANDERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 21952:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 21952) for the relief of James S. Baer, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The following statement by The Adjutant General, under date of January 28, 1911, covers the case completely, and from a careful examination of the same the committee agreed that the relief carried in the bill was proper:

It is shown by the records that James S. Baer was mustered into service June 30, 1861, as second lieutenant Company A, First Maryland Infantry Volunteers, to serve three years. He was promoted to first lieutenant, same company and regiment, and was mustered in as such to take effect November 5, 1861. He was subsequently promoted to be captain and transferred to Company G, same regiment, and he is recognized by the War Department as having been in the military service of the United States in the grade of captain Company G, said regiment, from December 12, 1862. With the exception of a short absence on detached service in April, 1864, it appears that he was present with his command from the date of his original muster-in to August 31, 1864.

He was tried by a general court-martial convened in September, 1864, on charge of "drunkenness on duty"; found guilty, and sentenced to forfeit all pay and allowance that were or might become due, and to be dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States. The proceedings, findings, and sentence were approved and promulgated in an order from headquarters of the Army of the Potomac dated September 28, 1864, which order announced that Capt. Baer ceased to belong to the military service of the United States from the date of that order.

In an order of the War Department dated February 5, 1867, so much of the order of the Army of the Potomac of September 28, 1864, publishing the sentence of Capt. Baer, was amended so as to omit so much of the sentence as "forfeits all pay and allowance that are or may become due him," that part being deemed "inoperative under the forty-fifth article of war," an article then in force which prescribed cashiering simply as the penalty for this offense.

Under date of November 15, 1864, a petition numerously signed by former officers of Capt. Baer's own regiment, as well as the officers of other Maryland regiments, was addressed to the Secretary of War in terms as follows:

"Capt. James S. Baer, Company G, First Regiment Veteran Volunteer Infantry, having been found guilty of the charge of drunkenness on duty (vide inclosure No. 1) by his own plea before a general court-martial convened by orders of headquarters Second Division, Fifth Corps, has been sentenced to be dismissed the service of the United States, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances due him or to become due him; and this sentence, being approved, has since been executed (vide inclosure No. 2).

"Now, without wishing to question form or substance of his trial and sentence we, the undersigned, beg leave to submit to you the following petition:

"Whereas Capt. James S. Baer, Company G, First Maryland Veteran Volunteer Infantry, has tested his patriotism on the 19th day of April, 1861, in Baltimore, Md., not only standing up to the national flag under dangerous and trying circumstances, but actually turned out in arms and defended for five days, under command of Col. E. Petherbridge, the threatened United States arsenal near Pikesville, Md.

"Whereas he furthermore displayed his zeal for the Union by entering the service of the United States on the 11th day of June 1861, and serving faithfully up to the Battle of Front Royal, Va., May 23, 1862, when he was taken prisoner whilst bravely defending and covering the extreme rear of the retreating forces over the bridge, and suffered captivity for over four months.

"Whereas he served out his original term of service and remustered as veteran for another term and as such was in discharge of his duty at his post with his company and regiment in every engagement of the present campaign in which his command participated.

"Whereas the inclosed certificate shows that his physical condition at the same time of the offense was such as if not to exculpate the offender, at least to mitigate the culpability to such an extent as not to call for the extreme penalty awarded under the mentioned charges.

"Whereas this penalty falls more unduly hard upon him and his family, as by the emergencies of this campaign and not by his neglect the arrearages of this pay had accrued to over seven months' salary, of which six months were due him before the offense was committed.

"That in consideration of these reasons the sentence against him may be remitted and he be reinstated, or, if this should be inadmissible, that he may be honorably discharged the United States service."

Accompanying the petition was a letted dated Baltimore, Md. November 14, 1864, and addressed to the Secretary of War, by John R. Kenly, brigadier general of volunteers, in terms as follows:

"The undersigned unites with the officers of the First Maryland Regiment of Volunteers in respectfully requesting that Capt. James S. Baer of that regiment, lately dismissed the service by sentence of general court-martial, may be reinstated.

"Capt. Baer was one of the first in this community who took up arms in behalf of the Government. He was mustered into the service in my regiment in June, 1861, as second lieutenant, and has risen to his present rank by successive promotions. Upon the expiration of his original term of service in June last he again volunteered and has since participated in several battles.

"In view of his courage, capacity, and length of service, I beg you to overlook his indiscretion."

There was also submitted with the petition a certificate of A. A. White, surgeon Eighth Maryland Volunteers, dated November 16, 1864, as follows:

"I hereby certify that at the time Capt. James S. Baer, Company G, First Maryland Volunteers, was put under arrest for drunkenness on duty and court-martialed that he had been under treatment for chronic diarrhea for two months, from the effects of which he was very much reduced and debilitated; and in consequence thereof, in my opinion, a small quantity of stimulant would produce inebriation which in a state of health would have been harmless."

Under date of December 10, 1864 the Judge Advocate General of the Army (Holt) made the following report upon the case:

"Accused pleaded guilty of drunkenness on duty. Proof was also introduced showing that when ordered to assume command of his regiment he was unfit to do so by reason of intoxication.

"His sentence was dismissal, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances. The latter part of this sentence, according to the uniformly expressed opinion of this bureau and the practice of the department, is inoperative and void under the forty-fifth article of war.

"Application is now made for removal of the disability to reenter the service.

"First. A surgeon's certificate states him to have been debilitated by chronic diarrhea to the degree that a small quantity of stimulant would affect him.

"Second. A large number of officers formerly associated with him in the Army testify to his loyalty and faithful and valorous service since June, 1861.

"Third. Gen. Kenly earnestly recommends clemency for the same reason.

"Fourth. Gen. Ayres and Gen. Warren approve the application. Gen. Meade, however, withholding his approval. Gen. Warren states that the accused belongs to one of the most respectable and devoted Union families in Baltimore.

"Fifth. It is represented that he tested his patriotism on the 19th day of April, 1861, in Baltimore, Md., not only standing up to the National Flag under dangerous and trying circumstances, but actually turned out in arms and defending for five days under command of Col. E. Petherbridge the threatened United States arsenal near Pikesville, Md.

"In view of the loyal adherence to the cause of the Union, so bravely exhibited in a disaffected community and at a critical period, as well as the general excellent conduct of the accused in the Army, it is suggested that the disqualification to be recommissioned may be removed without detriment to the service."

Under date of December 17, 1864, a communication from the War Department was addressed to the governor of Maryland advising him that the disability resulting from the dismissal of Capt. James S. Baer, First Maryland Volunteer Infantry, had been removed, and that Baer might be recommissioned should the governor of Maryland so desire; and on the same date Capt. Baer was advised of this action by the department.

Under date of November 1, 1890, James S. Baer applied to the War Department for a certificate of honorable discharge, stating as follows:

"He is the identical James S. Baer who was a captain in Company G in the First Regiment of Infantry, Maryland Volunteers; that he was enlisted in said regiment on or about the 30th day of June, 1861, at Baltimore, Md., as second lieutenant Company A, regiment as aforesaid, promoted first lieutenant Company A November 1, 1861, and promoted captain Company G December 16, 1862; that some of the officers and soldiers of his company were as follows, viz: Col. Nathan T. Dushane, Col. John R. Kenly, Capt. John W. Wilson, Lieut. Seth G. Reed, Robert Neely, Sergt. David L. Stanton; that he was honorably discharged on or about the 28th day of September, 1864, at Washington, D. C., in the State of ——; that his discharge certificate was never received; that he was court-martialed for alleged drunkenness on duty and dismissed from the service; but it having been made apparent to the major general commanding the Army of the Potomac that the claimant being a severe sufferer with chronic diarrhea and by order of the regimental surgeon having taken a prescription of wine that had but a brief temporary effect; that a personal animus prompted his prosecution; that injustice had been done him, the findings of the court-martial were annulled, the claimant restored to duty, and ordered to rejoin his command, paid up in full, but when he rejoined his command found vacancy filled, never received a discharge up to date of restoration, which he now prays as a legacy for his children."

The application for an honorable discharge was denied, and now stands denied, on the ground that the department is without power to set aside or modify a duly executed sentence of a general court-martial or to grant an honorable discharge to a soldier dishonorably discharged pursuant to such sentence.

Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 28, 1911.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Claims. I wish to inquire if he intends to call up at this session House bill 19115, the omnibus claims bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I had not intended to call up that bill for consideration at this session, because I have felt that with the mass of important matters pressing for the attention of the Senate and the length of time it would require to consider the bill, it would be practically impossible to consider it at the present session.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, this bill has been favorably reported to the Senate for about three months, and there has been no effort to bring it up. As I understand, these are judgments against the Government. All of these claims are due these people, and many of my constituents are urging the passage of the bill. I do not see any good reason for the action of the chairman in this matter. I have understood indirectly that the chairman of the committee does not want this bill passed; that he does not want the Government to pay judgments against it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I do not recall having expressed any such opinion as that. The majority of the committee have amended the bill and reported it. A number of the members of the committee have joined in a minority report. I have no objections to the Senate considering the bill whenever there is a manifest desire on the part of a majority of the Senate to do so. I assure the Senator from West Virginia that personally I have no desire to play the part of an obstructor against the consideration of the bill. When it comes up, however, I will say to the Senate that it contains perhaps 2,000 different items, and that they are separate and distinct, each resting upon its own facts, which are reported here. In addition to that, I presume there are on the table, awaiting the consideration of that bill, possibly 100 amendments, which contain proposals to enlarge the bill by adding that many divers claims to it. There will doubtless be sharp differences of opinion among Senators as to the merits of a number of these claims; and for the Senate to enter upon the consideration of them will necessarily involve a very lengthy discussion, take it in the aggregate, of the different items.

If it is the sentiment of the Senate that they want to enter upon the consideration of the bill at this session, I wish to assure the Senator from West Virginia that, so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, there will be no attempt and no inclination on his part to oppose the consideration of the bill in any arbitrary manner whatever.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, in justice to the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. CRAWFORD] I feel that it is proper that I should say that I am a member of that committee. I was not present when the bill was reported, but I have discovered no hostility on the part of the chairman of the committee to the payment of proper claims against the Government. The other House sent over to the Senate an omnibus bill embracing cases as to which there had been favorable findings by the Court of Claims. The bill is limited, if not absolutely, substantially—I think entirely—to claims which have passed through the Court of Claims. They are not judgments; they are findings of facts. The Senate committee eliminated a very large number of those claims which had been passed through the House, claims which were just and proper and ought to have been reported favorably; at least that was my judgment about them. The committee entertained different views and found differently in the report they made. That report of the Senate committee rejecting a very large number of claims which had been passed through the other House opens a wide field for controversy and discussion.

In addition to that, both the Senate and the other House omitted a great many claims which are in serious difference in the Senate, like the French spoliation claims. The Committee on Claims instructed the chairman to press this bill in the Senate and try to get consideration of it in the Senate. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who has been a rather persistent opponent of the payment of a large class of the claims that are presented against the Government, entertaining the opinion that they should not be paid, agreed to unite—unfavorable as he ordinarily has been to the payment of any of these claims—with the chairman of the committee to endeavor to get the Senate to take up and consider this bill as reported by the Senate committee. I am sure both of those Senators in good faith desire to carry out that instruction from the Committee on Claims, and that they would have asked the Senate to consider this bill if there had seemed to be the slightest possibility that anything would be accomplished by their efforts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if any of the French spoliation claims are now in the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They are not. No French spoliation claims are in the bill, and the fact that they are not in the bill is one that would bring about a protracted discussion and violent opposition to the passage of any bill that did not include those claims. That was one of the reasons which seemed to make it inexpedient to obtain action of the Senate during the short remaining time of the session.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is quite proper that it should be understood that, if any bill of this kind is to be considered, the French spoliation claims will be offered as an amendment to such a bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Many other amendments are to be offered, and a prolonged discussion of the scores of items in difference among Senators is inevitable. I say this as much to set myself right as to do what I consider justice to the chairman of the committee. There is not a Senator on the floor more anxious to have this bill considered than I am. Virginia has a great many claims in the bill, which I believe to be absolutely just, the payment of which has been denied during many years. I am exceedingly anxious to have the bill considered. I know neither the Senator from West Virginia nor any other Senator could be more anxious than am I to have this bill taken up and considered; but in justice to the chairman of the committee and to the Senator from Kansas, I desire to say that I have concurred with them that it would be absolutely impossible at this late day to get the consideration of the Senate for this bill. So I felt that it was necessary for it to go over to the next session and that it would be but a waste of time to attempt to pass it at the present session.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I will say that there is an amendment offered, which the committee did not adopt, which lies on the table, and whenever the bill comes up for consideration it will undoubtedly be pressed with great vigor, which provides that the French spoliation claims be incorporated in this bill. Two years ago, when a similar bill was pending here, the discussion of the French spoliation claims alone occupied the attention of the Senate in debate for days. The Senator from Kansas led the opposition to that bill, and there was an extended debate here running over weeks, when the omnibus claims bill was under consideration by the last Congress, directed to that one series of claims alone. Undoubtedly, if the bill comes up for consideration, those claims will be again presented and involve this Senate in an extended discussion of no one knows how many days. There is an amendment offered proposing that a claim of the Cramp Shipbuilding Co. be attached to this omnibus claims bill, a separate bill upon that subject having been reported unfavorably by the committee. It is a large claim; there seems to be a sharp difference of opinion as to its merits; it will be very vigorously opposed; and it will involve the Senate in an extended discussion.

There are other items in the bill which I know will involve the Senate in extended discussion. Senators will understand that there has been a desire here for weeks to close the business of the session, so that Senators may get away. The appropriation bills, however, are not yet disposed of, and in view of that situation I have felt that unless some general agreement could be arrived at, by which these numerous amendments might be dropped for the purpose of getting the bill through, it would be utterly useless to undertake to dispose of the bill at this session.

I thank the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] for his kindness in the matter. I have had repeated conferences with that Senator over the situation. I think he understands that I have been anxious, provided the way could be smoothed so as to avoid extended discussion, to get up the bill, to have it disposed of, and to let the differences be adjusted in conference; but it does not seem possible, Mr. President, to do that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, unfortunately I came into the Senate late. I desire to ask if the Senator is discussing the proposition of now considering the omnibus claims bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The chairman of the committee is only discussing it, as he was practically required to discuss it by a rather sharp and pointed inquiry made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] as to why the omnibus claims bill had not been brought before the Senate prior to this time.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed to know that the chairman of the Committee on Claims is so anxious to push this bill. The bill having been reported to the Senate for three months, no action having been taken on it, and no effort having been made on his part to get it up, I think I was justified in my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will withhold that demand if the Senator from Kansas desires to make a statement.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Claims I think it is proper for me, as a member of the committee, to say that there is not a Senator on this floor who more conscientiously devotes his entire time to the public service than does the chairman of the Committee on Claims; and if the Senator from West Virginia, after he has completed his term here, makes as good a record he will have reflected great credit upon himself and upon his State.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire calls for the regular order. The regular order is reports of committees. If there are no further reports of committees, the introduction of bills is in order.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BACON:

A bill (S. 7420) for the relief of the heirs or estates of Turner Brown and Nancy Brown, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 7421) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Loughry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that judges of the inferior courts shall be subject to recall; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I beg leave to introduce a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin ask for its present consideration?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that it may be read, so that it may appear in the RECORD. It will take but a moment.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 131) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"ART. XVIII. The Congress, whenever a majority of both Houses shall deem it necessary, or on application of 10 States by resolution adopted in each by the legislature thereof, or by a majority of the electors voting thereon, shall propose amendments to this Constitution to be submitted in each of the several States to the electors qualified to vote for the election of Representatives, and the vote shall be taken at the next ensuing election of Representatives in such manner as the Congress prescribes, and if in a majority of the States a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed amendments and if a majority of all the electors voting also approve the proposed amendments, they shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment providing for additional pay to the Second Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose salary shall hereafter be $2,750, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to give notice that immediately following the disposition of the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 24023), I shall ask the Senate to consider the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 18960).

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow morning, after the routine morning business, I will ask the Senate to consider House bill 22913, Calendar No. 856, being a bill to create a department of labor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator include in his notice a statement that it is not to interfere with appropriation bills?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I do not expect to interfere with appropriation bills. I do not know that it is necessary to put that in the notice, for I can yield at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 22650. An act to amend sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes; and

H. R. 23673. An act to abolish the involuntary servitude imposed upon seamen in the merchant marine of the United States while in foreign ports and the involuntary servitude imposed upon the seamen of the merchant marine of foreign countries while in ports of the United States, to prevent unskilled manning of American vessels, to encourage the training of boys in the American merchant marine, for the further protection of life at sea, and to amend the laws relative to seamen.

H. J. Res. 346. Joint resolution to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOURNE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 21279, known as the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 21279) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think it was understood when the Post Office appropriation bill was laid aside on Saturday last, during the consideration of the item relative to Federal aid to the construction of roads, that I should have the floor when the consideration of that bill was resumed. I want to address myself for a few moments this morning to specific data in connection with this matter, without regard to any theory that may have been advanced pro or con.

I have before me certain references, which I have been at pains to gather, showing what the attitude of the Government has been in reference to this matter of such prime importance. I myself have no practical knowledge as to what would be the ultimate outcome so far as expenditures by the Government are concerned in reference to road construction; but I have a very clear idea that, dating from the very inception of the Government, nothing has been of more importance to the people at large than efficient highways, particularly throughout the rural sections. These matters that I have gathered I think will throw sufficient light upon the question at issue, at least to modify the contention of some of those who are opposed to the House proposition.

In the discussion of this question the argument of those opposing the House provision is that the amount provided to be contributed by the National Government is absurdly small, in view of the statements made by Senators upon this floor as to the cost of adequate road construction; and it is particularly to that point that what I have to say this morning will be addressed.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that the amount provided was so dribbling and trifling that it would not and could not be seriously considered as entering into the construction of the public highways of the country or contributing materially to their maintenance once they were constructed. According to statistics printed by the United States Department of Agriculture, there is no class of roads which has increased so rapidly and given such efficient satisfaction as sand-clay roads. In a bulletin, House Document No. 582, Sixty-second Congress, second session, after reviewing the different kinds of standard roads and the percentage of increase and decrease, it is said:

> In no other class of improved roads has the mileage increased so rapidly during the five-year period as in the case of the sand-clay roads. The sand-clay construction consists of mixing sand and clay together in such a way as to produce a road which does not become muddy and which remains comparatively firm during wet or dry weather. * * * The progress in this class of construction is shown in Table 4.

I will ask that this table be inserted in my remarks.

I will read a portion of it and ask that the rest be inserted in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before I read this table, I wish to call attention to the fact—and I hope this matter is of sufficient importance that some of the Senators who oppose the House provision, and particularly the Senator from Kansas, will give me their attention—that the Agricultural Department in its bulletin, House Document 582, in reviewing road construction in its table, Table 4, says:

> From this table it will be seen that the mileage of the sand-clay road has increased from 2,979 miles in 1904 to 24,601.42 in 1909.

It says further in reference to this, on page 8 of the same report:

> In no other class of improved roads has the mileage increased so rapidly during the five-year period as in the case of sand-clay roads. The sand-clay construction consists of mixing sand and clay together in such a way as to produce a road which does not become muddy and which remains comparatively firm during wet or dry weather. This method of construction is confined principally to the southeastern States, although it is now being used to some extent in the Gulf Coast and Middle Western States. The progress in this class of construction for the five-year period is shown in Table 4.

According to Table 5, the average cost of this sand-clay road does not exceed $723 per mile for construction.

I have here also a table which shows the cost of maintenance after construction, but I will take it up later on.

As I take it, the prime object of good-roads construction is to reach the sections of agricultural production and give to these sections a practical, cheap, efficient road. And according to the testimony of the Department of Agriculture the sand-clay method, with the dragging process, seems to be the solution of the problem.

As I shall show and will quote later on, even in the clay districts this method of dragging the roads immediately after a rain has produced roads at a minimum cost which have been as efficient in their service as the best macadam roads for a certain kind of traffic.

Thirty-two States of the Union report a marvelous increase of these roads and a satisfactory use thereof. Granting that these roads cost but an average of $723 per mile for construction, and that a State or county bonds itself to procure the money to construct them, and that this money is secured at from 3 to 5 per cent interest, the $15 per mile proposed in the House bill will practically pay one-half of the interest on these bonds.

The cheaper the money may be borrowed upon these bonds the nearer the appropriation will come to paying the interest thereon, so that a community bonding itself for the construction of the road will practically be at no expense for the construction, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, or an additional taxation for the interest on the bonds. The enhanced value of the property contiguous to such roads increases its taxing value, and the State or community can by this additional increase in the valuation of the property create a sinking fund for retiring its bonded indebtedness without having the additional burden of paying the interest on these bonds and at the same time granting to the people of the community an efficient means of transportation and communication.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. As I understand from the Senator's presentation, he expects, on the cost of the construction of roads which he has stated, that the contribution or the rental paid by the Federal Government will pay half the interest charge.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In some instances it will pay all.

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator says that on the average the cost of construction is seven hundred and odd dollars a mile.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. What provision could be made for a sinking fund without a burden on the community or on the land itself served by the increased facilities?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My language there was to the effect that it would relieve to the extent of the amount the Government paid in the remittal of the interest on the bonds the burden of the local government to pay the interest on those bonds. In other words, if the community bonds itself at 3 per cent for the amount used in the construction of the road, the interest on that amount, the bonded indebtedness, would be paid by the Government, and the community would only be at the expense of keeping up the roads, maintaining them at that standard of perfection, and would, by virtue of the increased value of the property, be enabled, if it saw fit, to take the taxes from the increased value and create a sinking fund, and thereby practically relieve the community in the course of time from paying any interest on its bonds and ultimately liquidate the bonds.

Mr. BOURNE. Under the Senator's presentation, if the cost of construction of roads on the average was $700 per mile of road and the bonds bear 3 per cent interest—providing the community was able to float bonds at that rate of interest—still the community would have to bear a portion of the interest on the bonds. It would also have to bear the expense of the maintenance of the roads. It would also have to bear the taxation or the burden incident to a sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. The Government would simply pay about two-thirds of the interest on the bonds, on the assumption that the road cost $700 per mile and that the bonds bearing 3 per cent interest could be sold at par.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will say that further on I will show, according to experts—Government officials—that there is a difference of opinion as to the cost of construction of these rural roads, which is the matter of greatest importance to us, and that the highest average cost is $700.

I want to say further that according to one expert in a statement in a Government document, in different communities where experiments were made with sand-clay roads, that the increased valuation of the property contiguous to the roads had risen in two years from 50 to 100 per cent. Therefore the taxing valuation of the property had risen by virtue of the increased facilities for transportation for what is produced and for what is received from 50 to 100 per cent, and therefore the taxes that were laid upon it under the first valuation would practically, by the same number of mills, have doubled. Therefore those who had charge of the tax matters of the community had that increased tax to use in their judgment as a sinking fund to liquidate the bonds at their maturity, while the Government practically paid upon the cheap and efficient construction the interest on the bonds for the construction, and thereby give the whole rural community an efficient road service without an appreciable burden upon them; or, in other words, without giving a quid pro quo for what they received in the way of taxation upon the increased valuation of the property.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator from South Carolina to say that in some sections of the country the construction of roads at a cost of seven hundred and odd dollars a mile had increased the value of the contiguous property 50 to 100 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. What kind of roads had they before the $700 a mile road?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They had streaks—not roads. They just had the surface.

Mr. GALLINGER. In what part of the country was that?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I shall be glad to read from House Document 121, from the Government of the United States, page 754, a document printed in 1912:

> During the spring of 1910 an investigation was begun to ascertain the economic effect of road improvement upon communities. In this work counties were selected in which the roads were exceedingly bad and in which bonds had been issued for the purpose of improving the main roads. A preliminary study of these counties was made after the bonds had been issued and the roads selected, but before the actual work of improvement had begun. The amount of bonds issued and the names of the counties included in this investigation are as follows.

Then it gives Spottsylvania County, Va.; Dinwiddie County, Va.; Lee County, Va.; Wise County, Va.; Lexington Township, Davidson County, N. C.; Beat No. 1, Lauderdale County, Miss.; Russell County, Ala.; Dallas County, Ala.; Mantee County, Fla.; Wood Township, Clark County, Ind.; Riverton Township, Mason County, Mich.

That is a Government report, not my word.

Here is their conclusion, not my word.

The report says:

> In the counties where this investigation has now been in progress for two years it has been found that the price of land lying along the improved roads has already increased in value from 50 to 100 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Who made that report, if I may ask the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This is the report made by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, upon the investigation, as I understand, of over 400 experts, and hence the contention and the argument I am making now.

Now, I will go further. He says——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, all I want to put in the RECORD on that point is that it seems to me incredible that any such result could have followed, scattered all over this country, including portions of several States—that the improvement of a road at an expenditure of $700 a mile would have doubled the value of the real estate contiguous to that road.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Without making any reflection upon the Senator from New Hampshire, it is simply because the Senator from New Hampshire is not familiar with the conditions of all of the country or of most of the country. I mean the rural districts.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire has been over a considerable part of the country and is very familiar with rural conditions.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I suspect, then, if the Senator from New Hampshire was as familiar with rural conditions over the entire country as he is with conditions in New Hampshire, that he would agree with this. The Senator from South Carolina has considerable intimate knowledge of rural conditions on the Atlantic seaboard, and also the Piedmont, and believes the Government statement correct. I am not familiar with conditions that may obtain in and around and contiguous to the large cities and villages of New Hampshire, but I will take occasion, in the course of the remarks I am making to show that the cost of construction in some of the rural districts is higher, but it is almost a negligible quantity, when you come to consider the vast area of the agricultural districts over which light vehicles go. These ramifications of roads from villages and towns to which they converge divide their traffic as they multiply, while as they converge to the towns they multiply rather than divide the amount of the traffic. I suspect that wherein we get our incorrect idea of the kind of roads and the cost of construction is by virtue of being dwellers of cities and towns, accustomed to the great and congested traffic coming into the centers of transportation.

It was very startling to me when I first had occasion to search the figures. There are 2,151,379 miles of public rural roads in America. There is a total of improved roads in America of only 190,467 miles. Only 8 per cent of the entire public roads of America are improved.

Mr. BOURNE. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. Do I understand, then, that only 8 per cent of the roads in America to-day would come under the provisions of what is known as the Shackleford bill, if enacted?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Only 8 per cent.

Mr. BOURNE. Only 8 per cent would come under it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BOURNE. What would you do with the million miles of road which are used now by rural carriers?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The bill itself provides an argument in favor of the contention of those who favor the House provision—that out of 2,151,379 miles of public roads in America only 8 per cent are improved; and some of us find out by that why it is that the cost of living is so high and the unequal distribution of prices throughout this country, by virtue of the fact that we have not given sufficient attention to these great roadways that run into the agricultural communities, by giving them a sufficient means of transportation and communication.

Mr. BOURNE. I think every Member of the Senate—I am sure every member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads—is favorable to good roads, is favorable of a plan when demonstrated to be practicable and desirable, that will be conducive to the construction and maintenance of good roads. I think every member of the committee is cognizant of the fact that improved transportation facilities are beneficial to the communities served by same.

The question and study before the committee have been whether the Shackleford bill, as passed by the House, was, in the opinion of the committee, a practicable plan, which warranted them in giving it their support. The majority of the committee did not believe that there had been sufficient study given to the subject or that there had been sufficient data collected to justify the bill presented in receiving their support. They recommended as a substitute the creation of a joint committee for the purpose of making a study and reporting to Congress at its next session.

The question before the Senate is not the desirability of good roads—not whether they would benefit the community. I think we all concur that they are desirable and that they will benefit. The question is whether the bill as passed by the House should receive the support of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is exactly the point I am addressing myself to. I am arguing that the principle involved in the House proposition is the correct principle. Later on in my speech I shall discuss that and I shall give some evidence as I go further into it to prove my conclusion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the statement to which he has called attention, that the construction of roads may add 50 per cent to the value of the adjoining property, perhaps 100 per cent, of course sounds very absurd as applied to thickly settled regions like those of the New England States. Massachusetts, for instance, is almost one vast municipality, and the country roads connecting the different towns and cities have the perfection of city streets. There lands are of higher value, and perhaps it would be a startling statement to say that a section of good road there would add 10 per cent to the value of the adjoining lands, worth perhaps from $50 to $200 and more an acre.

But in the South and in the West there are large areas where the land possibly may not be worth more than $5 or $10 an acre, and the construction of a road, however rude, would add $5 or $10 or $15 an acre to that land, because it makes it accessible and convenient, whereas the addition of $5 or $10 or $15 an acre to the value of the land in New England would hardly be appreciable. In the one case it doubles the value of the land; in the other case it adds only 5 per cent, or perhaps 10 per cent, to the value of the land.

Whilst I have not any well-defined view in regard to the present Shackleford bill, I think the principle is a correct one, and that a mileage appropriation throughout the country will do more to advance roads throughout the entire country and increase agricultural production and diminish the cost of agricultural products than any other thing that can be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from South Carolina permit me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the differentiation the Senator from Nevada has made does to a large extent make answer to the objection I ventured to submit. There is a very great difference between the thickly settled parts of the country and the sparsely settled parts of the country, and there is a great difference between parts of the country where we have tolerably good roads and those——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Where we have intolerable roads.

Mr. GALLINGER. And those the Senator from South Carolina stated were trails, or something of that kind. I can see very clearly that if the land is to-day at a very low cost in certain portions of the States and the roads are intolerable an improved road would undoubtedly increase the value of the property to a very considerable figure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, Mr. President, in pursuance of the idea that I suggested, that at $700 per mile this $15 would go largely toward the liquidation of interest on bonds in case the communities saw fit to issue bonds and would pay the interest on the money that they themselves advanced in case they did not issue the bonds, I wish to say, what everyone appreciates, that the cheaper money may be borrowed, the cheaper the road may be constructed, the nearer the appropriation will come to pay the interest thereon.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in his remarks the other day said:

> To put the Federal Government alone in the position of having to pay for using a public highway which is free to all the rest of the world—I say, it is nothing but a subterfuge, a plain, flimsy, subterfuge—to get money out of the Federal Treasury and tax the people of this country thousands of miles away to keep up roads in the State of Virginia and other States who want to get this subvention.

There is a cry throughout the country in reference to the high cost of living. The Senator from New York is as much interested in the truck-growing, food-producing, textile-producing—in a word, the agricultural districts, the horticultural districts, the animal-industry districts—as the man in the South or West, where these things are produced. It is of prime importance to the producers of farm products to have adequate facilities for reaching the market as it is of prime importance to the nonproducer, but consumer, who buys these products.

Therefore it is not a question of one community—what they will receive or what they will spend—but it is a question of the united communities providing for such facilities that all may enjoy the benefits of these facilities.

Coming to the point that the Senator from New Hampshire raised, the towns and cities and villages, by virtue of density of population, the power of municipal taxation, and therefore small per capita taxation representing concentrated traffic need and should have in and around within a reasonable radius heavier and perhaps more costly roads. Traffic greater, wear and tear greater; but the ramifications of country roads in different directions as they diverge from these centers have less traffic per road, less wear and tear, therefore cost less. It is therefore to these branching roads—these feeders to the centers—that the attention of the Government should be particularly addressed.

Page 574, House Document No. 121, I have already practically quoted. Also, in reference to the increased value of the land. The Scientific American of date March 16, 1912, in an article by Logan Waller Page, Director of the Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, in discussing Federal assistance in the good-roads movement, says, and I invite the attention of those Senators who are interested to what Mr. Page says in reference to this very question under discussion:

> In order to reduce the cost of road building to a minimum and place good roads generally within the reach of every community, it is necessary that local materials be utilized to the fullest extent possible. Available materials, local conditions, road location, and character and density of traffic must all be carefully studied if we would avoid costly mistakes. Thus in large areas of the United States hard road materials are almost or wholly lacking, while the traffic is in general not very heavy. Here we find that by proper grading and drainage, together with systematic maintenance, our common earth or clay roads can be made to answer the present needs fairly well.

I invite just here at this point the attention of Senators, as to the cost of construction of this kind of road, to the statement by the head of the Good Roads Department of the Department of Agriculture. He says:

> In the greater portion of the agricultural districts of the South the cost of this form of construction is very low, ranging from about $300 to $600 per mile. This is no more than some of our States are finding that it costs annually to maintain the macadam roads subject to heavy automobile traffic.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator if the Agricultural Department are favorable to the passage of the House bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have not interrogated them, and therefore I am unable to answer that query.

Mr. Page further said:

> In order to reduce the cost of road building to a minimum and place good roads generally within the reach of every community, it is necessary that local materials be utilized to the fullest extent possible. Available materials, local conditions, road location, and character and density of traffic must all be carefully studied if we would avoid costly mistakes. Thus in large areas of the United States hard road materials are almost or wholly lacking, while the traffic is in general not very heavy. Here we find that by proper grading and drainage, together with systematic maintenance, our common earth or clay roads can be made to answer the present needs fairly well, nor is there any loss through this method of procedure. The earth built up in this manner forms the very best foundation on which to place a hard surfacing later, when means become available or the traffic becomes so heavy as to demand it. In the meantime we are learning the lesson of proper, systematic road maintenance, which at the present time is generally most sadly neglected on all of our roads.
> In the Southern and Southwestern States especially there are large sections where sand and clay are readily obtained. Clay and sand, when mixed in proper proportions, make a very good road surface for moderate traffic. The sand is very hard and admirably suited to resist abrasion, lacking only in adhesion or in binding power to form a firm road surface. The binding value is supplied by the clay. Only enough clay should be added to fill the voids, as its only purpose is to act as a binder. To secure the best results the sand should be sharp and fairly coarse, while the clay should possess a high binding value and be of fairly constant volume; that is, it should vary but little in volume with different amounts of moisture. Some of the so-called "ball clays," or sticky clays, while very difficult to incorporate uniformly with the sand, when properly mixed with a suitable sand form a very good road surface. The ball clays give much better results than loam or slaking clays. Such a road surface seems to be affected but little by moderate automobile traffic. Surface treatments of different kinds of oils have been tried on the sand-clay roads, but so far these applications have been productive of but little good. The material seems to be too dense to permit even a quite liquid oil when applied hot to penetrate appreciably into the surface. * * * In the South the automobile traffic is as yet comparatively light, so that we have very little definite knowledge of how the sand-clay roads are going to behave under heavy auto traffic. All we can say is that so far under moderate traffic the results obtained from this class of construction are most gratifying. The advantages of the sand-clay road have proved so great in the South that it would be advisable for many other rural regions to consider the possibility of using this class of construction before adopting other and more expensive methods.

I notice particularly the last paragraph. I think it is very essential to this discussion.

It says:

In the greater portion of the agricultural districts of the South the cost of this form of construction is very low—

I invite the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post roads to this language—ranging from about $300 to $600 per mile. This is no more than some of our States are finding that it costs annually to maintain the macadam roads subject to heavy automobile traffic.

I hope those Senators who are present will note what it indicates as being one of the means of the destruction of that very costly road.

Mr. Page says:

In the South the automobile traffic is as yet comparatively light, so that we have very little definite knowledge of how the sand-clay roads are going to behave under heavy auto traffic. All we can say is that so far, under moderate traffic, the results obtained from this class of construction are most gratifying. The advantages of the sand-clay road have proved so great in the South that it would be advisable for many other rural regions to consider the possibility of using this class of construction before adopting other and more expensive methods.

In substantiation, as cumulative testimony on this point, in Bulletins Nos. 21 and 26, United States Department of Agriculture, proceedings of the National Good Roads Congress held at Buffalo, N. Y., September 16–21, 1911, Col. W. H. Moore, president of the association, says in his address, on page 7 of this bulletin, what I shall read. I should like to read it just to give the experience of those who have dealt with this subject. I will begin with the first part of the paragraph:

In going through the various States, and I have recently had rather a large experience along that line, inquiry has been made again and again by those high in authority as to why Congress should do so much for the rivers and harbors, appropriating sometimes $20,000,000 for their betterment, and at the same time give to this question of primary importance—the question of common roads—little or no attention. It has been a mystery to a vast number of people that so little should be done by Congress for good roads.

To this I invite special attention. He says:

I do not believe that the Government will for a long time be in a position to build roads for the States. I do not believe such a thing should be advocated; but I do believe that, as the Government owns our post offices and carries the mails, it is proper for Congress to further the improvement of roads. The Government is pushing forward along the line of free mail delivery to all the people. Congress has set aside millions of dollars for that purpose, yet the office of public-road inquiries received from Congress at its last session an appropriation of but $20,000. I can not understand why more liberality was not shown. It is the duty of Congress to promote organization.

It is not a question of how much each State shall now receive, if the House provision becomes a law, it is simply a question as to whether or not this House provision will materially aid in the maintenance of roads constructed and serve to stimulate further construction of distinctly country roads, such roads as cost a minimum and in the aggregate give a maximum of beneficial results to the public at large.

In my opinion the principle involved in this proposed legislation is correct. Whether the amount proposed to be appropriated for the different classes of roads is correct, experiments and practical application will prove.

It appeals to those who have studied the question in one peculiar phase, that of eliminating governmental interference with the sovereignty of the States.

As early as 1819 John C. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, in his report to Congress on January 7, began this report by saying:

A judicious system of roads and canals constructed for the convenience of commerce and the transportation of the mails only, without any reference to military operations, is itself among the most efficient means for the more complete defense of the United States.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said the other day in discussing this question he did not think it equitable, right, or just for the United States Government to appropriate money for the benefit of people thousands of miles away, while John C. Calhoun, clear, logical reasoner, says:

The expense ought not to fall wholly on the portions of the country more immediately interested. As the Government has a deep stake in them * * * it ought at least bear a proportional part of the expense of their construction.

In conclusion I desire to say that where the material for cheap, efficient road construction is not available, where the cost of construction and maintenance of these roads become more costly, the appropriation of the Government should likewise be greater. Every citizen of the United States is directly and personally interested in every mile of public road in these United States. As they become more efficient the facilities for transportation and communication become more efficient; and as these become more perfected the prices of commodities and the cost of living become more uniform and stable. It is therefore not a question of the United States Government taking money from its Treasury and benefiting people a thousand miles away, but it is a question of a united people contributing out of their common fund to aid citizens of a State a thousand miles away in becoming efficient contributors to the common welfare and prosperity of all the States.

Now, Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that, in conclusion of what I have to say on this subject, I believe in the light of figures submitted in the experience of road construction throughout the rural districts of America this proposed legislation by the House is eminently in the right direction and constructed along proper lines.

I do not know—I have no means of knowing—whether $15 for the rental of a dirt road when kept in adequate condition is enough; I do not know whether $20 for the gravel or clay road is enough; I do not know whether $25 for your macadam road is enough; but I do know that where all the people desire to contribute of their surplus products to the benefit of those who do not produce, the foodstuffs and the different raw materials that enter into the consumption of our people, and where those who do not produce these desire efficient means of receiving them, the Government can not enter into a better work than that of seeing that the means of transportation and communication to the remotest districts shall be as efficient as possible, and whether one State under this bill by virtue of its good roads shall receive twice as much as another has nothing to do with the argument at all.

If I, in South Carolina, have not the facilities for sending my produce to market and thereby am eliminated from competition, all other States, every market in the world, feels this lack of competition. It is for the common people, all the people, who want an efficient supply from American soil for the American consumer to enter into this road construction that the produce of this country may have equal facilities for reaching the centers of distribution for the benefit of all the people. Then the State that has not good roads will double and treble, in the form of produce put on the market, its payment back to the different States who contribute out of their taxes to promote road building in that State.

It is almost puerile to argue this point for the reason that the undeveloped West with its marvelous resources had but to knock at the door of the Federal Treasury in order to promote railroad building, trail-building, wagon-road building, in order to invite settlers to settle along these highways; and from the produce of the soil contributes to the general welfare.

The main point of this proposed legislation from the House that appeals to me more than another is that the Government simply says that the different States shall construct efficient highways over which Government mail may go and that the Government will contribute. As Mr. Calhoun said in his report in 1819, as the Government has such a great stake at issue, to bring these roads to the standard which is designated in A, B, and C, it will contribute its pro rata share out of the common funds of all the people for the benefit of all the people.

I am not wedded to the appropriation of fifteen, twenty, and twenty-five dollars, according to classification of road; I am simply wedded to the principle, and if two, three, four, or five years from to-day I, as a friend of the development of agricultural communities, find that this amount is not sufficient, I shall without hesitation vote to double it, to quadruple it, and, if necessary, to add whatever may be necessary from all the people to develop the means of bringing all the people into communication each with the other, and allow those districts of our common country which produce citrus fruits to find easy and efficient means of supplying those who desire that kind of produce, and those who produce textiles to find easy and efficient means of reaching the market for those who desire textiles; and in like manner the manufacturing centers, when they have worked over our raw materials, to find easy and efficient means of reaching the consumer without burdening him with a mudhole tax and the ruin of his vehicles.

No man on this floor has a right to stand here and carp at this proposed legislation because it may be immature, tentative, experimental, and plead for a commission composed of those who live in and around cities and ride in Pullman cars; who do not understand that, as the roads leave the cities and villages they ramify, that the traffic is divided as many times as the number of roads ramify in different directions and concentrate in the same proportion as the roads find the turnpikes that lead into the cities. Hence the cost of the construction of roads contiguous to our cities must of necessity be more. This leads to a fallacious idea by those who are inhabitants of the cities and towns as to the cost of public road construction.

For one, I shall vote for the House provision on the ground that the Government proposes to begin to pay its pro rata share for the use of this efficient means of reaching all the people by a contribution of all the people for the benefit of all the people.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I only care to say a few words. I have no doubt about the constitutional authority of Congress to give national aid for the building of public highways; I have no doubt that right policy suggests national aid. The only question in my mind is the extent to which the National Congress should go and the plan that should be adopted. I had hoped that the House of Representatives would present some plan which could meet my approval. A portion of this plan is not seriously objectionable; but that which calls for the largest expenditure of money, in my judgment, is objectionable. I am disappointed that the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has not seen fit to suggest some plan which we could adopt now, in order that we might at the earliest moment possible give substantial aid to the State and to the local authorities in the construction of permanent highways.

In my own State of Ohio, on September 3, we propose to vote on a constitutional amendment which will authorize the issuance of $50,000,000 of bonds for road improvement. The State of Pennsylvania, I am advised by the public prints, contemplates an expenditure of $100,000,000 for the same purpose. This is an opportune time for Congress to take up this subject; but it does seem to me that if we are to adopt the plan which is proposed by the House instead of encouraging the permanent improvement of highways we shall be discouraging it, for this reason: In the report which I have before me, that was submitted by the Committee on Agriculture of the House, it appears that under what is known as class A there are now in the country 35,000 miles of improved highways, in class B there are 83,000 miles, and in class C 1,061,000 miles. Class A, without referring to the bill, includes such roads as are made by vitrified brick or by shell; class B includes roads which are made with burnt clay, gravel, or a combination of sand and clay or sand and gravel or rock and gravel; and class C, which includes the 1,061,000 miles of highways, embraces roads which are continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that they shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times. It does not pretend to describe the material with which this class of roads shall be improved, as I construe it. It embraces roads or highways composed simply of the soil which may exist in the locality, whether it be sand or gravel or clay.

The appropriation which is contemplated by this bill under the House plan would mean an expenditure of $25 per mile for class A roads, a cost to the Government of $875,000. Class B roads, with 83,000 miles, at an expenditure of $20 per mile, would cost $1,660,000, while class C roads, including, if I construe this provision rightly, that class of highway which is composed simply of the soil which may exist in the several localities, have a mileage of 1,061,000, which, at $15 per mile, would mean an expenditure of $15,915,000; in other words, we will expend for the improvement of high-class roads about two and a half million dollars, whereas we will under this bill give for unimproved roads $15,915,000; so that about five-sixths of this expenditure will go to keeping in repair simply dirt roads which exist in every community, irrespective of the amount of the improvement which the localities may make.

I am not sure that I am placing the right construction upon the language of the House provision, because in order to get any of this money the road must be—

> Continuously kept well compacted and with a firm, smooth surface by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles at all times.

Now, what does that mean? In many of our localities where the soil is composed of clay, during an open winter or when frost is coming out of the ground in the spring, the very best of the highways are almost impassable.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have not the bulletin with me, and am sorry that I left it at my office; but the Division of Good Roads has demonstrated beyond any doubt that even in the districts to which the Senator refers, namely, the clay country, the piedmont country, and the foothills in our mountainous regions, wherever there is anything like adequate drainage on the sides and the surfaces are rounded by a process of dragging, which costs—I will not repeat the figures, but will get the bulletin and submit the figures to-day, if this discussion does not close—by subsequent dragging just after a rain, within a year or two years the surface becomes as hard, as compact, as impervious to water, and as a consequence of being impervious to water, as impervious to freezing necessarily as the best bound clay or macadam road.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, meaning no disrespect, I suspect that that commission obtained its information in the office instead of by actual travel upon the highways; otherwise that statement would not be made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I hope the Senator wants to be perfectly fair in this, and I am sure I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I do absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They name the localities, they name the parties engaged in this kind of construction, and give the result of their investigation by States. Therefore it would be very easy for the Senator from Ohio and myself, if we were in doubt as to the truthfulness of the statement I have just made, to inquire of those communities whether the result as claimed in this bulletin is true or untrue.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know to what localities the Senator refers, neither do I know of the chemical composition of that soil; but I do know by actual experience in certain sections of Ohio, where they have clay roads, that it would be a physical impossibility by the mere dragging process to have the roads smooth during the winter season when they have an open winter or during the spring when frost is coming out of the ground.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to state right there, because it is the proper place to state it, that it is claimed that during the period intervening between frosts the road can be so perfected by virtue of the cheap process of dragging that the winter frosts have practically no effect even where there is nothing but pure clay, going upon the theory that dragging and repeating the process after each rain during the period intervening between the frosts produces the same effect as the mixing of clay by mechanical processes, getting it ready for burning the bricks, both under the old method of tramping with animals and the modern method of mixing with a machine, so that by the time the frost does come you have a compact clay surface so amalgamated that it is bound together and produces a satisfactory road at a minimum cost, even in the mountain regions.

Mr. POMERENE. I trust I may be pardoned if I should prove to be a doubting Thomas on that proposition, but I think an ounce of experience is worth a pound of theory. I have not the figures at hand which would justify me in making any estimate as to the cost of keeping up one of these clay roads by the process of dragging, but I do think that I am safe in making the statement that $15 per mile per year would be a very substantial portion of that cost. It seems to me that if we are to get the most out of the appropriations which we are to make for this subject, we should encourage the permanent improvement of the highways rather than the keeping in repair of the ordinary dirt road.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is claimed that the dirt road is permanent after a few years of the treatment to which I have referred.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, as I have said, I am a doubting Thomas on that subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not rise to get into any argument on this subject at all, but I think the Senator probably has overlooked the fact that the $15 a mile is not to be used for ordinary dirt roads; it is only to be used on those roads which are ditched, rounded, and dragged, so as to produce a hard surface, although the material may be the ordinary material——

Mr. POMERENE. Which exists in that locality——

Mr. REED. Which exists in that locality; but there is a vast difference between that kind of a road and simply a native road which is not ditched, which is not dragged, and which is not brought to this condition; in other words, it is the difference between a high-class dirt road well kept up and an ordinary road, so that it would seem to me that would make a difference.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the matter of mechanical construction would have something to do with it, but it is nevertheless an ordinary dirt road; and, in my judgment, if the Federal Government should pay at the rate of $15 per mile for keeping in repair that kind of a road, instead of its encouraging the local authorities permanently to improve their roads, it would encourage them to rest on their oars and permit all improvements and repairs to be made at the expense of the Federal authorities alone.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that there is no provision as to the width of the roads falling under class C. Class A and class B roads are required to be at least 9 feet wide. I think it will be taken for granted that hardly any improved road would exist which would not have a width of at least 9 feet, because otherwise it would be impossible for wagons meeting each other to pass, yet when you come to class C roads there is no provision as to even that width; in other words, they are not required to be even 9 feet wide, leading to the conclusion that they might only be of the width necessary to accommodate one wagon and not of sufficient width to allow wagons to pass. Why, then, if these roads are to be drained by ample side ditches, would it be objectionable to have a provision requiring them also to be at least 9 feet wide? The answer, it seems to me, must be that the roads are not expected to be maintained at 9 feet in width, and that they are intended to be classed within class C, so that the ordinary country road in its natural condition shall receive benefit under this act.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Florida is entirely correct in his statement of facts, and I am afraid he is correct in his statement of the purpose of the manner in which this act is drawn.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to say to the Senator that the figures as to the cost of construction of the sand-clay road, the macadam road, and the bituminous road, which goes up into the tens of thousands, were all predicated upon a hard surface of 13 feet. The usual road bed, or the right of way as it is called, is 30 feet. The contemplation here was a hard surface to be put on as a means of continuing passage and to avoid the delay of hardening the surface the entire 30 feet of the right of way——

Mr. POMERENE. To what plan does the Senator refer?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am referring to the estimate which I read, where it said it cost $723 a mile. The hardened surface was 13 feet. This bill—I have not looked at it—the Senator from Florida says proposes 9 feet. I should suppose that if the estimate had been for only 9 feet in the figures I have read, a sand-clay road might be built for the difference between 9 and 13 feet, and therefore cost less than the Scientific American says—cost less than $300 a mile.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is referring to a highway which is permanently improved by some composition of sand and clay. But that is not the kind of road to which I have been addressing myself. It seems to me that before we appropriate this vast sum of money there ought to be more consideration given to the adoption of some permanent plan of improvement which the Federal Government would be willing to aid. I realize that a comparatively small sum of money may do a great deal toward encouraging the permanent paving of highways throughout the country.

Perhaps two years ago I gave some little investigation to this subject, and, with the permission of the Senate, I want to give some of the figures which I then collated.

The average cost of a battleship is $10,000,000. The average cost of making a paved roadway 14 feet wide, constructed out of the best vitrified shale paving brick, is about $15,000 per mile. The price of one of these battleships would build 660 miles of paved highway, made out of the best vitrified brick, to a width of 14 feet. In other words, at the price of one of these battleships, three highways could be constructed across the State of Ohio from north to south or from east to west.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day suggested that it would cost $1,200 per mile to make a good gravel highway. Assuming that it would cost $1,250 per mile, at the cost of one of these battleships you could build 8,000 miles of graveled highway. Now, I do not say this in opposition to the improvement of our Navy so much as I do to show what we can do with the expenditure of a few million dollars carefully and economically placed.

My thought has been that the Federal Government should grant this aid in such a way as to give the maximum of encouragement to the local authorities, and I believe that if some plan were adopted whereby the Federal Government would give to the local authorities so much per mile for the construction of a paved highway, and so much per mile for a graveled highway, or any highway made of any material which was of a permanent character, we would thereby encourage the local authorities and the State authorities to help along this good cause.

All of us must agree that there is a great necessity for this kind of improvement; we will all agree that it has been too long neglected, and the concern of all is to adopt some plan which will give the maximum of good at the least expenditure. For that reason it seems to me it would be unwise now to expend nearly $16,000,000—accurately speaking, $15,915,000—out of a total contemplated expenditure of $18,450,000, in order to help to drag a few dirt roads. I do not believe that by so doing we would be encouraging the cause of good roads.

In order that this may be hurried along as rapidly as possible, assuming that this amendment of the Senate committee shall be adopted, I would suggest that instead of requiring the joint committee to make its report at the earliest moment practicable, we require them to report on the first day of the coming session of Congress.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. In reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I am sure he would not want the joint committee to make an unfinished report. He would not wish them to report the result of the progress made, if they have come to no definite conclusions at the time. I think it is the desire of the committee to expedite the matter as rapidly as any Member of the Senate can desire it to be done, but it would be their purpose to do it in an intelligent way and to submit their conclusions based upon an ascertainment—a study, an analysis, a deduction, a conviction—and that submitted to the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt the committee, both in the Senate and in the House, have given a great deal of time to the consideration of this subject, and I have no doubt they have collected valuable data, and that this can be supplemented by information which can be had from other sources.

The difficulty is that if we are going to delay fixing a date for this report the end of the next session of Congress will be here before there is any report made, and it seems to me it would be a very good way for Senators and Representatives on this committee to spend a part of their vacation, to take up this subject and give it the diligent and thoughtful attention, as I know they will, and make the report in the early days of the coming session of Congress.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat, does he think that that would be exactly fair, first, to the American people and then to the Department of Good Roads in the Agricultural Department, when they are working, issuing bulletins, getting up the data, visiting every State, and examining every possible kind of road construction, giving the cost both of construction and maintenance? I have in my hand here their report of 1912. We have a Department of Good Roads that was provided for some 8 or 10 years ago. They are at work every day and every week, and are issuing their bulletins and giving us exhaustive tables as to the different kinds of roads and the different costs of construction and the durability of the various kinds of roads.

It seems to me it would be an additional cost and an extraordinary expense for no possible good, when these bulletins and these data are at the command of every Senator.

I suspect that what is the matter is that we have not studied the data we have on hand, and want the joint committee to gather from the good-roads department and the other sources at our command what we as Senators in this body ought to know before we formulate legislation.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator will pardon me for a moment. I have no doubt the committee would avail itself of all this information in the consideration and preparation of its report. Certainly they want all the information they can get from any and every source. But let me ask the Senator from South Carolina a further question.

He first called the attention of the Senate to the fact that valuable data had been collected. Let me ask whether this provision of the House bill, with reference to the expenditure of nearly $16,000,000 upon the ordinary dirt roads of this country, is the result of the information which has been collected and to which he referred a moment ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I beg to state, in answer to that question, that it is not the ordinary dirt road as insisted upon by the Senator from Ohio. The bill provides that there shall be certain specifications, a certain standard of excellence, that the road shall be reasonably passable at all seasons of the year for traffic, for wheeled vehicles, and that it shall be drained on each side; and the department further says that in case that is done, at a minimum cost, the road can, by a cheap process of dragging and putting a little clay mixed with sand on it, be made permanent, and once made permanent with this amount, it can be kept permanently in repair.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. The Senator from South Carolina has referred repeatedly to the Department of Agriculture and particularly to the Bureau of Good Roads. On the 22d of June I submitted a letter to the Secretary of Agriculture in reference to this particular bill and the practicability of carrying out its provisions, and the opportunity under the bill of getting the information necessary in order to make the classification A, B, C, as set forth in the bill, and the cost to the Government of so doing.

Under date of June 26 I received the following reply:

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of June 22, asking for information concerning the possible participation of this department in the carrying out of the Shackleford amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill, I have the following statement to make:

(1) There is no available force in this department at present that could be assigned to this work.

(2) The appropriation recommended for the Office of Public Roads for the coming fiscal year is $202,120, all of which is apportioned for special lines of work.

(3) A force of from 250 to 300 trained men would be necessary to classify the post roads as designated in the Shackleford bill. It would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to obtain and organize such a force, the duties of which would occupy such a short period of time.

(4) The cost for the first year for making such a classification would probably be from $750,000 to $1,000,000, and this work would be of an absolutely nonproductive nature.

(5) The cost of continuing this classification after the first year would probably be between $200,000 and $300,000 per year, depending on the demand for the work.

Hoping that I have answered these questions to your satisfaction, I am, Very respectfully, JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Further, Mr. President, in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads Mr. L. W. Page, the gentleman who has been referred to several times here in this discussion, stated, in response to a question asked by Senator GORE:

I think the worst feature of this measure—

Referring to the Shackleford bill—

I think the worst feature of this measure is that it is not going to help the road situation at all, but it is ultimately going to bring a very heavy expenditure on the part of the Government.

Mr. Page further stated in the hearing referred to that—

Up to the present time about 62 bills for national aid in some form have been presented to this Congress, and they call for very large sums of money. There are a great many of them the results of which have not been considered and the effects of which, I think, would be very dangerous. I consider this measure—

Referring to the provision now under consideration—

among the more dangerous. If all the roads of this country—there are about 2,250,000 miles—were constructed in a first-class manner it would cost about $22,000,000,000. This is a very conservative estimate. I think there are only about $16,000,000,000 in the world, and four or five billion of that are unsecured notes. If we were to sprinkle the roads of this country for one summer season with ordinary watering carts and water, it would cost about $880,000,000, which is $200,000,000 more than the national revenue. Any plan for the Government to participate seems to me to require a good deal of consideration.

I do not think that the bulletins that are issued by the Department of Agriculture would give the Senate or Congress sufficient information upon which to take intelligent action upon a subject of this moment and importance to the country.

I thank the Senator from Ohio for yielding.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate further, except to say that I am willing to go any length in encouraging the cause of national aid for public highways, but I want the money expended in such a way that we will get value received for it.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I present the conference report on House bill 22195, and move its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 22195) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule K thereof, being paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'SCHEDULE K. WOOL AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

"'360. On wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and on all wools and hair on the skin of such animals, the duty shall be 29 per centum ad valorem.

"'361. On all noils, top waste, card waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, yarn waste, bur waste, thread waste, garnetted waste, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and on all other wastes and on woolen rags composed wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 29 per centum ad valorem.

"'362. On combed wool or tops and roving or roping, made wholly of wool or camel's hair, or of which wool or camel's hair is the component material of chief value, and all wools and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 32 per centum ad valorem.

"'363. On yarns made wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 35 per centum ad valorem.

"'364. On cloths, knit fabrics, flannels not for underwear, composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description and character, clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section, webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, on any of the foregoing composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and on all manufactures of every description made by any process of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, whether containing india rubber or not, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 40 per centum ad valorem.

"'365. On all blankets, and flannels for underwear, composed wholly of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 38 per centum ad valorem.

"'366. On Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; on Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; and on carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms, and Oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, the duty shall be 50 per centum ad valorem.

"'367. On Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; and on velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, the duty shall be 40 per centum ad valorem.

"'368. On tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise; on treble ingrain, three-ply, and all-chain Venetian carpets; on wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain carpets; on druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise; and on carpets and carpeting of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 30 per centum ad valorem.

"'369. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description.

"'370. On all manufactures of hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, or of which any of the hair mentioned in paragraph 360 form the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 49 per centum ad valorem.

"'371. Whenever in this act the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animals, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.'

"SEC. 2. That on and after the day when this act shall go into effect all goods, wares, and merchandise previously imported and hereinbefore enumerated, described, and provided for, for which no entry has been made, and all such goods, wares, and merchandise previously entered without payment of duty and under bond for warehousing, transportation, or any other purpose, for which no permit of delivery to the importer or his agent has been issued, shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry or withdrawal thereof than the duty which would be imposed if such goods, wares, or merchandise were imported on or after that date.

"SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1913."

And the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
J. W. BAILEY,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

O. W. UNDERWOOD,
D. W. SHACKLEFORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

During the reading of the report,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that in constructing the report there has been a repetition of section 370 and paragraphs 2 and 3 of section 371. There is nothing to do but to erase it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After the conference reached an agreement, it adopted the same report made upon this same schedule one year ago. The preparation of the report, which consisted in attaching the printed pages of the former report, was left to the clerks of the two committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is evidently a manual error.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I presented the report just as they handed it to me. The error arises probably from using the printed pages of the conference report of 1911, which is identical with the present report, and I presume an extra page has been attached by mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the fact. It has been constructed by pasting a printed page.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the way it occurred, I have no doubt.

After the conclusion of the reading of the report,

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether this is the same bill that was passed by the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was just going to make a statement, unless the Senator from Utah——

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Bacon	Cullom	Massey	Smith, S. C.
Bailey	Cummins	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Dillingham	Nelson	Stone
Borah	Fall	Newlands	Sutherland
Bourne	Fletcher	Overman	Swanson
Brandegee	Gallinger	Page	Thornton
Bristow	Gronna	Penrose	Tillman
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Townsend
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Warren
Burton	Jones	Reed	Watson
Catron	Kern	Root	Wetmore
Chamberlain	La Follette	Shively	Williams
Clapp	Lodge	Simmons	Works
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Crane	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate, 65 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the error to which the Chair called attention arises from the clerks having inserted an additional page of the former conference report—the printed report. It is exactly in accordance with the conference agreement excepting in that respect. I have compared it with the report as presented to the House, and except for that page, which was inadvertently inserted by the clerks in putting the papers together, the two reports are in perfect agreement. I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw that page, the insertion of which was a mere clerical error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it proper to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is simply a duplication of what is in the report. It does not differ in any particular from what appears in the report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does not belong there, in any event, and it should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not desire to take a moment of the time of the Senate, unless it should be made necessary later, further than to say that the conference report presented at this time is identical with the conference report of 1911 upon the same schedule. It was found impossible to make any changes. I would have been glad to have secured the rates fixed in the bill as passed by the Senate, but if an agreement was to be arrived at at all some compromises were necessary, and it was found that the only compromise which could be effected was upon the lines of the compromise on the same schedule of one year ago.

If it will be at all helpful to Senators I can say that the reduction of duties, as compared wtih the existing law, taking the duties as figured out one year ago on the Payne-Aldrich bill, are as follows:

On clothing wool, to begin with, the duty under the Payne-Aldrich law, and I repeat that I am using the importations of last year and in figuring out the ad valorem, is 44.5 per cent. I am certain the importations at the present time will not make that rate materially different. The duties on clothing wool under the Payne-Aldrich law are 44.5 per cent and under the conference report 29 per cent.

On carpet wool 37.24 per cent, and under the conference report 29 per cent.

On combed wool or tops and on wool or hair advanced in any manner beyond the washed or scoured condition the duties fixed under the Payne-Aldrich law are 73 per cent, 111 per cent, 112 per cent, and 252 per cent. The duty fixed under this conference report covering the entire paragraph is 32 per cent.

On yarns valued at not more than 30 cents per pound the duty under the Payne-Aldrich law is 134 per cent, valued at more than 30 cents a pound it is 76 per cent, and under the conference report these duties would be 35 per cent.

Cloth, knit fabrics, plushes and other pile fabrics, dress goods, wearing apparel, trimming, and so forth, under the Payne-Aldrich law carried duties of from 60 to 159 per cent. Under the conference report they would carry a duty of 49 per cent.

Blankets and flannels for underwear under the Payne-Aldrich law take a duty of 71 to 182 per cent. Under the conference report, if it were to become a law, they would carry a duty of 38 per cent.

Carpets under the Payne-Aldrich law, or under existing law, take a duty of from 50 to 80 per cent. Under this conference report the duty would be from 30 to 50 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, I think I need make for the present no further statement than to say to the Senate that in so far as the duties are concerned the conference report presented at this time is identical with the conference report presented one year ago on this same schedule.

There is in one section a change of a dozen words to correct a verbal error that was found in the conference report upon reviewing it, to which, let me say to the Senate, the conferees upon both sides and of both Houses were agreed. It makes no alteration whatever in the rate as fixed in the conference report of 1911 and the conference report which I present to-day.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin how these rates compare with the rates submitted by the Tariff Board. Are they very much lower?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that opens up a pretty wide subject for discussion. I think it would be difficult indeed for any two men taking the report of the Tariff Board to arrive at exactly the same conclusion with respect to the rates. I think I may say, however, as a corollary to what I have already said, that no absolute rate can be deduced from the report of the Tariff Board on any specific thing, and if it were possible to figure out a rate upon which everybody would be agreed was the specific thing as reported by the board, upon which there could be no dispute, then I think it would follow as a matter of reasoning that that could not safely be taken as an absolute rate. A very slight change in the condition which the Tariff Board found when they made their investigation would alter any conclusion which they reached. Suppose, for instance, the mills were to vary the hours of labor, laying off their hands, we will say, on Saturdays for a period of time. If that occurred after the board had made its investigation of the cost of production in that mill or in those mills, then the results would quite materially change.

So it is not possible to put your finger upon any particular rate and say that that is the absolute finding of the board. Neither would it be possible for the board to make an absolute finding which they could say to Congress should guide them in making rates.

I think that the duty of 29 per cent fixed upon all wools in the conference report just presented is a little lower than can be fairly inferred to be from the conference report, in the judgment of the Tariff Commission, upon the duty to be fixed on raw wool, but at the same time an examination of that report will show that in 20 per cent of the wool production of this country, that being the production of wool upon the large farms or ranches, where the keeping of sheep is a matter of relative importance, the cost of producing wool is nothing; that the business is conducted mainly for the profit derived from the production of mutton; that the production of mutton gives upon the great flocks upon the ranges a profit, and that the wool produced is really a by-product, and is, to use a common expression, what would be regarded as velvet, or clear gain, while on the small farms, where sheep are kept in little flocks, if the expense is figured out there it is so materially increased that perhaps 75 or 100 per cent would not be a sufficient protection; that is, that sheep so kept are not considered as a business by itself—is not an economic business—but fitted in the general economy of the farm, kept as a sort of scavenger in their grazing; the small flocks, when taken with everything else on the farm, are worth while to the farmer.

Now, that is a somewhat extended and somewhat perhaps disconnected answer to the Senator's inquiry, but I think it makes the best answer that can be given from the report of the Tariff Board.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he considers the report of the Tariff Board to be in favor of ad valorem rates?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; Mr. President, I do not, and if we are to go into that subject, and I am perfectly willing to go into it, I think it can plainly be shown upon the best authority in this country that the Tariff Board are radically wrong. I am prepared to go into that subject at length if it is raised, and to demonstrate, I think, beyond any question, upon the very highest authority of this country, recognized as the highest authority of the country among manufacturers, by which it can be shown that the conclusions of the Tariff Board in that respect are radically wrong.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President, the question involved in the report of the conference committee involves, as I understand it, something more than a mere question of schedules. It involves, as I understand the matter, a question of principle upon which for many years I have entertained and have now decided views.

So far as other Senators are concerned, I presume they possess an advantage in determining how they ought to vote on this report. Upon education and by principle based upon the legislative history of the country I am now, and expect to continue to be, without apology, a believer in the doctrine of a protective tariff. Wool and sugar are two of the industries from which the people of my State expect to receive and have received advantages under a protective tariff.

I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a tariff speech, and I do not intend at this time to do so further than to say that while I am not wedded to a schedule and while I realize that any tariff schedules that may be agreed upon by this Congress will probably not meet the changing conditions of the country five years from now, or possibly less, I, as a protectionist and a believer in the doctrine of protection, have my doubt as to the wisdom of voting for a bill that meets the approval of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. Therefore, I shall be compelled, not because my own State is peculiarly or particularly interested in the wool industry, to vote against the substitute tendered in the way of amendment by the conference committee.

I say this so that my attitude may be understood and so that there may be no question of my action as a Senator from one of the sovereign States of the Union. I realize in saying it that Senators upon the other side of the Chamber are just as sincere in their attempt to secure a revenue tariff as I am to secure a protective tariff; but, as I have said, having very serious doubt as to the protective features of a wool schedule that can meet the support of the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, I shall not vote for the pending conference report upon the theory that we are getting any protection. Therefore, I shall vote against the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to concur in the conference report.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the conference report, but to make a very brief statement with respect to my own attitude toward it.

A year ago I voted for a conference report that was identical with the report now before the Senate. Since that time the report of the Tariff Board upon this subject has been made. I have given it the most diligent and the most impartial study of which I am capable. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in the statement that it is impossible for any man to make deductions from the report and assert that they are the only deductions that can be made from it. Nevertheless, I reached the conclusions which I stated when I presented my amendment to the House bill. I stated then, and I believe it to be true, that the minimum duty upon scoured wool or clean wool warranted by the report of the Tariff Board for all wools of a higher price, say, 40 cents a pound or more, is 15 cents a pound, with a maximum duty on the lower-priced wools of 40 or 45 per cent. The duty of 29 per cent on all wools, as measured by the facts, as I understand them, disclosed in the Tariff Board report, is substantially less than 15 cents a pound on clean wool. It is so substantially less that, following the course which I originally laid out for myself, viz, that without good evidence to the contrary I would accept the information furnished by the Tariff Board, I can not vote for the conference report, much as I desire a substantial, even a radical, reduction in the duties upon wool and the manufactures of wool. In the coming roll call, if I were at liberty to vote, which I shall not be, having paired myself with a Senator who would, if present, vote for the conference report, I should vote against it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, instead of taking the time of the Senate to discuss this subject, and particularly the report of the Tariff Board on Schedule K, the schedule under consideration, I am going to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an analysis of the report of the Tariff Board upon this schedule made by Mr. Samuel S. Dale, editor of the Textile World Record, published in Boston. I will only say in introducing this analysis that Mr. Dale is not a theoretical expert upon this subject. He attained his commanding position as the leading authority in this country through practical experience. He served his apprenticeship in the business of wool manufacturing, worked up through all the grades, became the superintendent of a large mill, had an extended experience as such superintendent, and finally became editor of the Textile World Record. His standing is such among all wool manufacturers and among tariff experts that the Tariff Board engaged him to prepare a critical analysis of Schedule K and to advise the board as to the best methods of making a study of the cost of production in the woolen industry.

I understand that he was connected with the board from the fall of 1910 until April or May, 1911, when he resigned, because he disagreed with the methods the board proposed to follow in the investigation of the industry. They disregarded his advice, and since he was convinced that they were proceeding along wrong lines, he severed his relations with the board. Since the publication of its report on the wool schedule he has made a comprehensive review of it, which I have here in printed form.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that I think Mr. Dale's analysis has been printed in the RECORD at the instance of some Member of the other House, and practically all of it has been printed in the RECORD at my instance in connection with a speech I delivered the other day. I would suggest to the Senator that, instead of printing it in the RECORD, it be made a public document.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I should like to have it put in the RECORD in connection with the proceedings of to-day, and

I make that request now, without taking further time of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I suggest to the Senator, in addition to that, that he ask that the analysis be printed as a public document.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask, in addition, that Mr. Dale's analysis be printed as a public document. (S. Doc. No. 898.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the paper, the nature of which he has stated, be printed in the RECORD without now being read, and also that it be printed as a public document. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I do not object, but I simply wish to say that I shall probably ask that there may be put in the RECORD a similar document, prepared on somewhat different lines, but, I think, with equally good authority.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Prepared by whom? Who is the author?

Mr. WARREN. I may bring in one or two or three authors. I do not present the paper now, but I simply say that I shall present it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The analysis referred to is as follows:

[Reprinted from the Textile World Record, Boston, June, 1912.]

ANALYSIS OF THE TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON SCHEDULE K.

(By Samuel S. Dale.)

The report of the Tariff Board on the wool and wool-goods schedule should be judged first by the extent to which the board has succeeded in attaining the professed object of its investigation, namely, the determination of the difference between the foreign and domestic cost of producing the raw materials and the partly and wholly manufactured products of wool manufacturing.

THE DIFFERENCE IN COST FORMULA.

This object has been definitely and repeatedly stated during the last four years, and recently by the President in these words:

"First, by fixing the rates at figures * * * based on the difference between the cost of production here and the cost of production abroad, ascertained by means which preclude all doubt of the substantial accuracy of the calculation."

In order to show to what extent this object has been attained by the Tariff Board I have made the following list of the principal products affected by Schedule K, and annexed a brief statement of the information disclosed by the Tariff Board regarding the difference in the domestic and foreign cost of each: Raw wool, wool by-products, shoddy, worsted tops, roving, yarn, cloths and dress goods, carpets and rugs, underwear, hosiery, felts, and narrow fabrics.

RAW WOOL.

The method adopted by the board for calculating the cost of wool is stated on page 313, as follows:

"We have considered wool as the chief product and the receipts from mutton are offset against costs. When the receipts from mutton are less than the total flock expense, the difference is called the 'net charge against wool.' When, on the other hand, the receipts from mutton are greater than the expense, the difference is the 'net credit to wool.' And this net charge against or net credit to wool, divided by the number of pounds of wool, is the 'net charge against or net credit to a pound of wool.'"

On the preceding page, 312, the board condemns this method in these words:

"Another method is to consider wool the chief product and mutton the by-product and to charge the total operating costs to the mutton and credit the net income of the business to the wool. * * * When, however, the receipts from mutton equal the operating costs, the cost of producing a pound of wool, as found by this method, is nothing; and when the receipts from mutton exceed the operating costs it is less than nothing. * * * It is evident that this method also is inadmissible, because the cost of producing a pound of wool thus determined varies with the relative importance of the receipts from wool and mutton. When wool is the chief source of income and the receipts from mutton are merely incidental and relatively small, this method is approximately correct; but as the receipts from mutton become relatively more important, the degree of error increases, and when mutton is the chief source of income and the receipts from wool are merely incidental, the futility of the method is clearly apparent."

This condemnation of its own method was superfluous. The absurdity of a calculation by which the cost of wool is a positive quantity under some conditions, zero under others, and under others the wool is obtained without cost, bringing a bonus with it, is self-evident. The report contains extensive tables of cost of American wool based on this misleading method of inquiry.

For the foreign branch of the wool inquiry this method of calculation, of course, could not be carried out in such great detail, but the results are given for Australian wool on page 11, as follows:

"In New Zealand and on the favorably situated runs of Australia it seems clear that at the present range of values for stock sheep and mutton the receipts from other sources than wool are carrying the total flock expense. So that taking Australasia as a whole it appears that a charge of a very few cents per pound lies against the great clips of that region in the aggregate."

The report itself supplies the proof that the board has failed completely to determine the difference between the foreign and domestic cost of wool. The board admits this in these words on page 10:

"It is not possible to state in exact terms the actual cost of producing a pound of wool considered by itself."

WOOL BY-PRODUCTS.

These products include noils and the various wastes that are unavoidably made in converting wool and by-products into finished goods. They are inferior grades of raw material. In calculating the cost of wool goods the value of the by-products is deducted from the cost of the raw material used in order to determine the net cost of the latter. No part of the cost of manufacturing is charged to the production of by-products. For this reason the Tariff Board is right in the following conclusion, page 12:

"No comparison as to the cost of production of such products can be made."

SHODDY.

Wool rags may be properly classed as a wool by-product, and the omission of any reference to their cost is explained on that ground, but shoddy is a manufactured product for which rags are the raw material. The report contains no statement on the cost of manufacturing shoddy.

WORSTED TOPS.

In taking up the various wool products in their order of manufacture, worsted tops are the first for which the Tariff Board offers a detailed comparison of cost. A number of important features of the board's investigations of comparative costs will therefore be considered under this head, but it should be borne in mind that the remarks apply not only to tops, but to wool manufactures generally.

The report gives a comparative statement of the domestic and foreign cost of converting wool into tops, but makes no attempt to give the cost of raw material. It is evident, however, that the difference in the total cost of a wool product must be known in order to apply the difference in cost principle in fixing tariff rates. The omission of any important items of cost makes the comparison worthless for that particular purpose. In the case of worsted tops the board has omitted the item of raw material, which constitutes approximately 90 per cent of the total cost of worsted tops. The reason for such omission is plain. The variations in the cost of raw material, not only for tops, but for other forms of wool manufactures, are so great from grade to grade and from time to time that its determination is impossible. This impossibility in the case of wool fabrics was recognized and frankly stated by the board, page 628, in these words:

"The question of raw material was eliminated altogether, since this is such a fluctuating element."

That is true of worsted tops as well as cloths. Turning to the board's investigation of the conversion cost of tops, attention is called to the fluctuating and uncertain elements involved as outlined on pages 640 and 641 of the report. Admitting these fluctuations and uncertainties does not eliminate them, and they alone would thwart the purpose of the inquiry. But on top of all these factors the board informs us, page 641, that the mill records disclose "the widest divergencies" in the conversion cost of worsted tops:

"In attempting to arrive at the cost of tops from a consideration of actual mill records for a given period of time, we have found the widest divergencies due to the difference in output. For a six months' period in one mill the average cost of production for all tops was only 4.28 cents per pound, while for another six months' period in the same mill running upon practically the same quality of tops the actual average was 9.37 cents per pound. In the first period, however, the output was about three and one-half times the output in the second period. In the first case the mill was running overtime and in the second case much of the machinery was idle, while the fixed and overhead charges continued the same."

The Tariff Board attempts to meet this situation by assuming a theoretical production on the basis of a full running time. This, however, is assuming a condition that is never found to prevail throughout the industry or continuously in any combing plant.

If so much emphasis had not been placed on the difference in cost theory we might profitably stop here and accept the evidence disclosed by worsted tops as conclusive that the theory can not be applied to the revision of Schedule K. As far as tops are concerned, we find that an item constituting approximately 90 per cent of the total cost has been omitted entirely, because it could not be determined, while the items making up the remaining 10 per cent are subject to "the widest divergencies." The conclusion is unavoidable that the board has not determined and can not determine the difference between the domestic and foreign cost of tops.

ROVING.

No attempt is made to give the costs of roving separately. This cost is made up of raw material and the various processes up to and including worsted drawing. Raw material, as we have seen, is eliminated entirely from the board's calculations. The final process, drawing, is considered on pages 1031 to 1034, but, as in the case of woolen yarn, the figures relate to the labor cost only, all the other items of expense being omitted. We have noted the defects in the calculations for tops, the cost of which is included in the cost of roving, so that it is now necessary only to record the unavoidable conclusion that the difference in cost has not been determined for roving.

YARN.

The noteworthy feature of the board's report on yarn costs is the omission of essential details relating to the cost of carded woolen yarn. On pages 1025 and 1026 there are the reports of the labor cost of woolen carding in 26 mills. On pages 1040 and 1041 are reports of the labor cost of woolen spinning in a like number of establishments. Nowhere is there a statement of the cost of the other items, such as raw material and manufacturing expense, which make up much the greater part of the cost of woolen yarn. The report deals in greater detail with the cost of worsted yarn. On page 645 there begins a general survey of the question. On page 646 are statements of cost for four separate weeks in one mill. It is rather puzzling to find the output given as "yarn shipped," but, accepting the figures as indicating the yarn spun, we find the conversion cost varying from 9¼ cents on August 26 to 26½ cents a pound on August 5, with the yarn size practically the same. No better proof of the impossibility of determining cost for the purpose of applying the difference in cost formula to the revision of tariffs is required. The board attempts to avoid this difficulty, as in the case of tops, by assuming a full output. Thus on page 646:

"In view of this difficulty the Tariff Board has adopted a general rule of figuring all costs on the basis of full normal output, as in the case of tops."

This is assuming a condition that never prevails for any considerable time throughout the industry. Moreover, the question arises, How did the board revise the cost returns received so as to determine the result that would have been actually reached if the mill had been doing something that it was not doing?

On page 650 the report says:

"Figures of cost were secured in England from various manufacturers on actual samples, and in the second column in the table below are given the figures which represent the average of these various calculations."

From this it is evident that the board obtained from "various manufacturers" in England estimates of cost of certain grades of worsted yarn. These estimates were averaged by some unexplained process and the results tabulated on page 650 for the purpose of comparison with the figures obtained from American mills and revised by the board at Washington. That is the result, or, rather, lack of result, attained by the board in investigating the cost of the material, white worsted yarn, which of all the multitudinous products of wool manufacturing offered the least difficulty in such an inquiry.

CLOTHS AND DRESS GOODS.

The cost of cloths and dress goods includes the cost of the yarn and the conversion cost of the yarn into the finished product. To include in the cost calculation for cloth the operations which the board adopted for the preceding processes would concentrate in this calculation all the uncertainties and errors which have been referred to under the head of raw wool, wool by-products, shoddy, worsted tops, roving, and yarn. Moreover, such a method was impossible because of the omission of essential items, as in the case of by-products and shoddy. The Tariff Board evidently recognized this dilemma, for a new start was made with yarn treated as a raw material and the cost calculations for the preceding processes eliminated entirely. The report thus explains how this result was accomplished, page 628:

"An arbitrary price was assumed for different qualities of wool and yarn, this arbitrary price being the actual price so far as it could be accurately determined for a given date."

This method has the merit of boldness and simplicity, although it can not be claimed that it "precludes all doubts of the substantial accuracy of the calculation." The figures thus adopted by the fiat of the board as a substitute for the cost of raw material and its conversion into yarn are termed "prices for a given date." This does not change the fact that they are not costs as contemplated in the formula. It makes the matter worse, for it shows that the board's ideas were so unstable as to shift from production cost to price without hesitation. This confusion of ideas regarding cost and price is so complete that one of the estimates, No. 32, page 672, contains this:

"This gives a total cost of 86 cents per yard for those making their own yarn and 95.5 cents per yard where yarn is purchased."

The adoption of the fiat figures of cost for wool and yarn would alone make the results of this part of the inquiry worthless, regardless of the accuracy of the subsequent calculations, and for that reason it is perhaps unnecessary to say more on this particular point. Attention is called, however, to the fact that the list of the figures thus adopted by fiat for wool and yarn is omitted from the report. It is to be found on Tariff Board schedules 1128 and 1129. The following grades and prices are given in the list to cover carded woolen yarn made of wool and mixtures of wool, cotton, shoddy, and by-products:

12 to 16 cut, one-fourth blood worsted waste and shoddy	$0.55
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and shoddy (colors)	.65
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and noils (white)	.70
12 to 20 cut, one-fourth blood and noils (colors)	.75
12 to 20 cut, straight one-fourth blood (white)	.80
20 to 28 cut, straight, three-eighths blood (white)	.85
From 20 to 28 cut add 1 cent per cut.
32 cut, fine white carbonized	.95
40 cut, fine white carbonized	1.10
2–12 to 2–18 cut, one-fourth blood worsted waste and shoddy	.50
2–18 to 2–20 cut, in grease	.62½
2–18 to 2–20 cut, in colors	.70
2–22 to 2–24 cut, skein dyed in colors	.77½

There are no established standards for such yarns. They are spun from new wool of every grade; also from mixtures containing wool, cotton, shoddy, and by-products, in every imaginable proportion—some with the wool, cotton, shoddy, or by-products omitted, and the mixture made up of the whole or a part of the remaining materials. Not only the proportion, but also the cost per pound of each of these materials varies widely from grade to grade and from time to time. As a result the average cost of the mixtures is subject to even greater fluctuations.

Fixed prices or cost figures are equally absurd in the case of worsted yarn and wool. No feature of the Tariff Board's investigation excites greater astonishment than does this substitution of arbitrary prices for actual cost. This extraordinary method has evidently been adopted not only for American costs, but for foreign costs as well. Take, for example, sample No. 26, page 667. This cloth is made of two grades of cotton yarn and one of worsted. The report says, page 667:

"The average cost of the yarn used was $0.692 per pound; the resulting cost of the stock material in a yard of cloth is $0.55."

The English cost of the yarn is thus stated, page 668:

"The yarn material for a yard of cloth is taken at a cost of $0.4085."

These figures do not represent cost in any mill, either in this country or abroad. They result from some undisclosed system of estimating, based on arbitrary prices for foreign and domestic yarn. Such calculations do not come up to the level of ordinary guesswork.

As was the case when studying the board's cost figures for worsted tops, the temptation again becomes strong to leave this feature of the report with the conclusion that the case against the difference in cost formula has been proved, but so much emphasis has been placed on this formula that we will go on to the end of the list.

CONVERSION COST.

Turning to the inquiry into the cost of converting yarn into cloth, the fact claiming attention first is that the board's figures do not relate to the actual cost of the cloths, but to estimates of their cost. This is admitted on page 628, where the report, after stating the impossibility of determining the actual cost, says:

"The only method available was to start with certain specific cloths and get the most accurate estimates possible from a number of different mills on the cost of making goods of this quality."

The inherent difference between actual cost as contemplated in the formula and an estimate of cost is evident. A manufacturer may estimate the cost of a fabric regardless of whether the goods were made in his mill or not. He determines the character of the raw material by the exercise of judgment and the construction of the fabric by analysis, and with these particulars makes an estimate of cost based on assumed conditions of market price of materials and expense in the mill. This, however, is not the actual cost, which is determined only by the actual manufacture of the goods, and it is the actual cost which is meant in the difference in cost formula. Not only has the board substituted estimated cost for real cost, but these estimates have been obtained under conditions that make irregularities and errors inevitable.

The report states, page 629, that the agents of the board "visited the mills with samples and worked out with the proper officials the cost under each separate process." The published results of their labors are found on pages 651 to 690, in the form of estimates of cost of 55 samples of American wool goods, and on pages 694 to 704 in the form of estimates of the cost of 14 samples of foreign fabrics.

Fortunately it is not necessary to rely solely on one's own judgment or on the opinion of others as to the merits of this system of cost estimates. Three years ago, in 1909, the American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers adopted the same plan and submitted to a large number of manufacturers the specifications for three worsted and two carded woolen fabrics, with a request that estimates of the cost of these goods be returned to the association. As was done by the Tariff Board, uniform prices were assumed by the association for the wool and yarn. Following is a statement of the lowest, highest, and average estimates.

Statement of the lowest, highest, and average estimates.

	Lowest.	Highest.	Average.
Fabric A	$1.50	$2.02	$1.75⅝
Fabric B	1.47½	1.93	1.78
Fabric C	1.06	1.53	1.29
Fabric D	1.10	1.65	1.37
Fabric E	.85	1.02½	.93¾

Such figures are worthless, and it is certain that the estimates of the Tariff Board are no better.

The sole difference between the estimates of the association and those of the Tariff Board is that the agents of the board worked out the figures with the mill officials in accordance with a definite system prescribed by the board. But a cost system can not be applied successfully in a mill on short notice. It is necessary first to apply a system for a long period, a year or more, in order to determine the cost per unit of production in the various departments of a mill. Not before this is done does it become possible to make a fairly close estimate of the cost of a given fabric when made in that mill under like conditions. An attempt, such as was made by the Tariff Board, to apply suddenly to a large number of unprepared mills a new system of cost estimating is calculated to give results as misleading and erroneous as were those obtained three years ago by the American Association of Woolen and Worsted Manufacturers. This is evident from the details of the board's estimates. For example, the conversion cost of sample No. 1 is given as 8 cents per yard, and this note of explanation is annexed, page 652:

"Taking all of the cost secured by the board, from mills of all sizes, the average conversion cost is 11.1 cents per yard."

This means that some of the estimates must have varied from 8 cents to considerably over 11 cents a yard. No two mills would agree as to the estimated cost, yet the board adopts one set of figures for each sample. Why was 8 cents selected for the figures given in the report when the average was 11.1 cents? And was this average calculated by a method that gave the mills an equal weight regardless of size? These questions may appear superfluous in view of the fundamental defects already noted in the calculations, but reference is made to them in order to make the analysis as complete as possible. For the same reason a review will be made of various other features of the estimates.

A number of the estimates refer to fabrics made of wool yarn mixed with cotton or silk yarn. An application of the difference in cost formula would make it necessary to determine the cost of the cotton and silk yarn as well as the wool. Nowhere is such cost given. Apparently arbitrary figures have been assumed for the cost of the silk and cotton yarn as well as for the wool yarn, and an average of the three calculated by some unexplained process. For example, sample No. 24, page 666, is made of a mixture of cotton, silk, and worsted yarn, and the "cost" of the three is given as follows:

"The average cost of the yarn described is $0.714 per pound, making a total stock cost of $0.571 per yard of finished cloth."

The plan pursued in the board's estimates of the foreign cost of the various samples is thus explained on page 630:

"The method adopted in securing foreign costs on American samples was similar to that used in this country. Samples of identical fabrics, cut from the same piece, were taken to England and to the Continent. These were shown to a number of manufacturers, and their estimates on the cost of production secured, but not in the same detail as in American mills, because foreign manufacturers do not keep their costs in any such detail. In England the costings on these samples are given with the authority of a cloth expert, himself a manufacturer, who took the English estimates secured and corrected or verified them from his own experience or from the costs in his own mill."

The woolen and worsted industry in England is organized on a different basis from that generally prevailing in this country. Cost calculations are simpler and probably more accurate in that country than they are here. For these reasons a fair comparison of the costs in the two countries is possible only after careful revision. Such a complicated cost estimate schedule as the one prepared by the Tariff Board would stagger English manufacturers. The above extract from the report makes it plain that they did not understand the board's system and did not attempt to carry it out. Figures, however, are easily obtained, and the agents of the board obtained them from a few English manufacturers. Evidently these figures bore the marks of unreliability, for they were referred to a "cloth expert, himself a manufacturer," who "corrected or verified them from his own experience or the costs in his own (English) mill." It is unnecessary for us to follow this system into France and Germany. Adopted in response to an order to determine the difference in the cost of production, "by means which preclude all doubt as to the substantial accuracy of the calculation," it abandons the cost of production entirely, and substitutes estimates based on assumed figures for the greater part of the cost, and for the remainder on methods that are unworthy of serious consideration either at home or abroad. The Tariff Board knew of the defects in estimates of cost, as the following passage, page 628, shows:

"The difficulty here lay in the well-known fact that estimates on the same sample by different manufacturers may vary very widely, and experience in this regard by associations in the trade who have attempted to arrive at some standard cost method showed the necessity for adopting every precaution to make these figures as detailed, accurate, and fair as possible."

But stating a difficulty does not overcome it, and the knowledge on the part of the board that estimates would not disclose what they were seeking only increases the surprise that such a plan was adopted. No precautions can make estimates conform to actual cost. In the absence of a knowledge of the actual cost there is no way of verifying or correcting the estimates.

CARPETS, RUGS, UNDERWEAR.

The report gives no information regarding the cost of these goods, this explanation for the omission being found on page 9:

"It proved impracticable to carry out at one and the same time an indefinite number of separate cost inquiries and bring them all to conclusion at a given date. For this reason we are not able to include in the present report data as to the cost of underwear and carpets, regarding which our investigations are not sufficiently advanced to make the results practically useful."

HOSIERY, FELTS, NARROW FABRICS.

On the cost of these products the Tariff Board makes no report deserving consideration.

We have reached the end of the list of products. Summing up the situation we find that the Tariff Board's inquiry into cost of production has nowhere given results in whose accuracy any confidence can be placed. Some wool products were omitted entirely—carpets, knit goods, felts, and narrow fabrics—for lack of time; by-products, because the task was impossible.

A fundamentally unsound method was adopted for raw wool. Where costs were actually investigated, as in the case of worsted tops and yarn, the fluctuations from time to time and from mill to mill made self-evident the impossibility of determining the costs for the purpose of fixing tariff rates. For some materials, roving and yarn for example, the manufacturing expenses other than labor were omitted. Likewise in some cases raw material, subject as it is to constant, extreme, and indeterminate variations in cost, was eliminated bodily from the calculations. In other cases arbitrary figures were assumed to indicate the fluctuating and uncertain cost of raw material. Estimates were substituted for statements of actual cost. Calculations that could be but little better than guesswork were made for the board by foreign manufacturers. And finally the reports thus collected were "revised" and "edited" at Washington in an attempt to make them harmonize with each other and conform to conditions of production that seldom if ever exist.

The contrast between this result and the President's definition of what was required is grotesque, but the failure to attain the announced purpose of the inquiry does not necessarily carry with it any reflection on the ability, industry, or faithfulness of those who did the actual work of investigation. The fact is, they were engaged in an undertaking that reached far beyond the limits of the possible. The difference between the domestic and foreign cost of producing wool and wool goods can not be determined for the purpose of fixing tariff rates. Criticism, if it is indulged in, should be directed to the failure to recognize the impossibility of the difference in cost formula and direct the inquiry into practical channels. If that had been done, the cost of production would not have been ignored, but would have received its proper share of attention in connection with many other factors bearing on the tariff question. The primary mistake was in making the inquiry hinge on the difference in cost formula. That placed on the board the work of accomplishing the impossible.

FEATURES OF VALUE.

Although the chief purpose of the investigation resulted in failure, as was inevitable, the four volumes of the report contain a considerable body of useful information. In this may be included many of the conclusions regarding the existing tariff law and among which are the following:

"Wools of heavy shrinkage can not be profitably imported into the United States (p. 381).

"Clean wool of the light shrinking sorts (is procured) at a materially lower net rate of duty than the law apparently contemplated (p. 381).

"Low-priced grades of wool can not be profitably imported (p. 391). If admitted under a revised tariff, they could be substituted for large quantities of cotton and shoddy that are used at present.

"There is no valid reason for the discrimination that now exists as between the wools of class 1 and class 2 (p. 11).

"The duty on sorted wool was made excessive for purposes of exclusion, and that is its effect (p. 49).

"The present duty of 33 cents per pound on scoured wool is prohibitive, preventing effectually the importation of clean, low-priced foreign wools of the lower grades that would be exceedingly useful in the manufacture of woolens in this country, and if so used might displace in large measure the cheap substitutes now so frequently employed in that industry (p. 11).

"The present tariff excludes all noils except a small quantity of high grade (p. 75).

"The present tariff on wool waste, rags, and shoddy is prohibitive, except on a small quantity of very high grade (pp. 4, 5, 12, 13, 69, 71, 78, 82). Shoddy is not necessarily the cheap undesirable material that many take it to be (p. 69).

"Wools of class 3 are used in the manufacture of goods other than carpets (p. 413).

"The present duty on worsted tops is prohibitory, because the compensatory duty is excessive (pp. 107, 189).

"The present duties exclude all yarn except very high grades, of which but a small quantity is consumed (pp. 116, 190).

"The present specific or so-called compensatory duties on manufactures of wool are excessive, and result in making the tariff on such goods prohibitory, except for a small quantity of high-priced products, the duties being the highest on low-priced goods (pp. 5, 13, 14, 139, 149, 164, 182, 188, 124, 125, 133, 147, 167, 184).

"Domestic prices of wool goods are not always increased to the full amount of the duty imposed on competing foreign products (pp. 5, 14).

"Prohibitive duties eliminate the possibility of foreign competition and offer a temptation to monopoly and conspiracy to control domestic prices" (p. 5).

These are statements of fact, but of well-known facts that have been iterated and reiterated, particularly during the last three and one-half years, and their appearance in the report of the Tariff Board now is but the acceptance of what has been publicly demonstrated and spread upon the records of Congress.

THE SCOURED WEIGHT OF GREASE WOOL.

We now come to a consideration of the conclusions reached by the Tariff Board. The first to claim attention is the recommendation that a specific tariff on wool be based on the scoured weight (p. 12):

"That the chief objection to the present rate on the grease pound could be met by levying some form of specific duty based on the clean or scoured content of the wool imported.

"That the necessary machinery for testing at ports of entry could be installed promptly and cheaply and could be maintained efficiently at small expense."

After recommending a specific duty based on the scoured weight of wool as a desirable and entirely practicable substitute for the present specific duty on grease wool of classes 1 and 2, the board qualifies its opinion, on page 397, as follows:

"Objection is made to a flat rate upon the scoured pound on the ground that it would not be fair to subject wools of varying value to a uniform rate of duty. It must be conceded that there is some reason in this, but in any event it would give access to all fine, heavy fleeces on equal terms with the lighter-conditioned wools, thus meeting one great objection to the existing law."

IS THE SCOURED WEIGHT TARIFF DESIRABLE?

Two questions must be answered in passing upon this scoured weight proposition. Is the plan desirable? Is it practicable? Fortunately the first question can be readily and conclusively answered by applying a specific rate to the very large quantity of scoured wool sold at the London wool auctions. This scoured wool is, as regards variation in price, fairly representative of the wool sold in the greasy condition. Thus by applying a specific duty to the scoured wool an illustration is obtained of how such a duty would operate if imposed on the scoured weight of foreign grease wool imported into the United States. This test of the scoured weight wool duty has necessitated considerable labor in classifying the wool sold at London according to price. In view of the superior facilities possessed by the board and the importance of the question involved, it is somewhat surprising that such a test was not made and the results given in the report. In a letter to the Ways and Means Committee on March 15, 1909, I gave a statement of the high, low, and average prices of about 80,000,000 pounds of wool sold by auction at the last sales at London, Liverpool, and in Australia. Following are the prices for the scoured wool included in that statement, with a specific duty of 20 cents per scoured pound applied in order to show the effect of the plan recommended by the Tariff Board. Corresponding variations would result regardless of the particular specific rate imposed:

Scoured wool sold at London in January and February, 1909.

Another illustration of how a wool duty based on the scoured weight would operate in practice is shown in the following statement of 2,847 bales of West Australian, Adelaide, and New Zealand wool sold at the first series of London sales in January, 1910. In this case the number of bales sold at each price is given. The ad valorem equivalent of a specific duty of 20 cents per scoured pound is given for each price and also for the average price of the 2,847 bales:

THE DEFECTS OF THE SCOURED BASIS FOR TARIFF RATES.

These exhibits tell their own story. They show that a specific duty based on the scoured weight of wool is subject to ad valorem variations fully as great as those now resulting from a specific duty on the grease weight. This is not at all surprising to those familiar with the prices and shrinkages of different grades of wool, although it had escaped the attention of the Tariff Board up to the time of making their report on Schedule K. In recommending the scoured weight as a basis for a specific duty on wool they apparently assumed that the scoured yield was the main factor in determining the value of grease wool, ignoring the equally important factor of grade. The value of grease wool depends upon both shrinkage and grade. These two factors may work in conjunction to raise or lower the price per pound, as when a low-grade wool of heavy shrinkage results in a low price in the grease, and when a high-grade wool of light shrinkage makes a high price in the grease; or they may work in opposition to each other, as when low grade is combined with a light shrinkage and when a high grade is combined with a heavy shrinkage. In each of the last two cases one factor tends to increase the grease price, while the other tends to depress it. These factors of shrinkage and grade are found in such endless proportions, sometimes working together to determine the grease price, at other times in opposition, that a specific duty per scoured pound is subject to ad valorem variations practically as great as in the case of a specific duty per grease pound.

Illustrations of these conditions, which the board has overlooked, are found in the report itself. On pages 387 to 391 is a statement of the yield, scoured cost, and ad valorem equivalent of the Dingley duty of 11 cents a pound on various lots of wool imported by an American worsted mill. We will take for comparison the 30 bales of Australian merino bought on March 8, 1909, and the 50 bales of South American crossbred bought on December 22, 1906. The Payne (Dingley) duty on the grease weight and a specific duty of 20 cents a pound on the scoured weight of these two lots are as follows:

	Australian.	South American.
Grease cost, cents	26.15	26.13
Dingley duty, per cent	42	42
Shrink, do	49.12	34
Scoured cost, cents	51.39	39.6
20 cents per scoured pound, per cent	38.9	50.5

Here are two lots of wool costing the same per grease pound and on which the ad valorem equivalent of the Payne duty is the same. But as a result of the varying shrinkage the costs per scoured pound are 51.39 cents and 39.6 cents, respectively, and the ad valorem equivalents of a 20-cent rate per scoured pound are 38.9 per cent for one lot and 50.5 per cent for the other.

For another illustration, take the 105 bales of Australian merino bought on November 25, 1907, and the 100 bales of South American crossbred bought on June 20, 1908. The results from these two lots are as follows:

	Australian.	South American.
Grease cost, cents	26.6	15.28
Dingley duty, per cent	41.3	71.8
Shrink, do	53	33
Scoured cost, cents	56.6	22.82
20 cents per scoured pound, per cent	35.3	87.6

In the case of these two lots the specific duty per grease pound varies from 41 per cent ad valorem on the first lot to 72 per cent on the second, but great as this variation is the 20-cent rate per scoured pound varies even more, from 35 per cent on one lot to 87.5 per cent on the other. The 20-cent rate per scoured pound has decreased the ad valorem duty on the fine wool 6 per cent and increased it on the coarse wool 16 per cent.

This feature of the wool tariff is so important that I have calculated the ad valorem equivalents of the 20-cent rate per scoured pound for the lots in this statement that were bought in 1907 and 1908. The results follow, compared with the ad valorem equivalents of the 11-cent rate per grease pound:

Here are 79 lots of foreign wool bought in 1907 and 1908 by an American worsted mill. On some of them the 11-cent rate of duty per grease pound gives a higher ad valorem than does the 20-cent rate per scoured pound. On others the 20-cent rate per scoured pound is the higher. This variation is the result of the varying shrinkages. With a shrinkage of 45 per cent the 11 cents per grease pound and the 20 cents per scoured pound give the same ad valorem rate. On wools shrinking more than 45 per cent the 11 cents per grease pound gives the higher ad valorem equivalent. On wools shrinking less than 45 per cent the 20 cents per scoured pound gives the higher ad valorem rate. The 11-cent rate per grease pound on these 79 lots varies from 32.9 per cent to 75.2 per cent ad valorem. The 20-cent rate per scoured pound on the same lot varies from 33.2 per cent to 90.9 per cent. In other words, the application of a specific duty per scoured pound has resulted in a fluctuation of 174 per cent above the minimum in place of a fluctuation of 129 per cent under a duty per grease pound.

As only the lightest shrinking wools are imported into the United States under the present duty, the 79 lots given above fail to disclose the comparative effects of the specific tariffs based on the grease weight and scoured weight of wools of low grade and heavy shrinkage. On such wools the specific duty would be prohibitory, regardless of whether it was based on the grease or scoured weight. Take, for example, the very large quantity of foreign wool shrinking about 65 per cent and selling for 8½ cents, giving a scoured cost of 25 cents a pound. The Payne duty of 11 cents per grease pound would be equivalent to 126 per cent ad valorem, while the 20-cent rate per scoured pound would amount to 80 per cent ad valorem. Both rates would have the same effect—exclusion. It would help neither the manufacturer nor the ultimate consumer to know that they were deprived of these low-priced but useful materials by a duty of 80 per cent instead of 120 per cent. The burden of exclusion would be as heavy in one case as in the other. For all practical purposes the 20-cent rate per scoured pound on those low-priced wools would be as high as the 11-cent rate per grease pound.

Such are the practical effects of the scoured-weight duty, which the Tariff Board tells us (p. 398) "would remedy most of the primary faults of Schedule K; and (p. 396) would admit on equal terms wools of light and of heavy shrinkage which our present method fails to do." Such are the practical effects of the scoured-weight duty which President Taft states (p. 4) "obviates the chief evil of the present system and tends greatly to equalize the duty." The President and the Tariff Board are wrong in their conclusions. The facts are the reverse of what they state. Instead of decreasing the diversity resulting from the present duty per grease pound a specific duty on the scoured pound would increase it. A specific duty per scoured pound would bear heaviest on low-priced wools, which would be wholly excluded, whereas now under a specific duty per grease pound a small quantity of low-priced light shrinking wools is imported. Bad as a specific tariff based on the grease weight of wool is, a specific tariff based on the scoured weight would be worse.

IS THE SCOURED-WEIGHT TARIFF PRACTICABLE?

Having found that a tariff based on the scoured weight of wool is even more objectionable than the present tariff based on the grease weight, it is not worth while to devote much time to a discussion of the practicability of the scoured-weight basis. It claims some attention, however, because the President and the Tariff Board have laid special emphasis on the practicability of that system. Thus, on page 397, the board says:

"The Tariff Board has carefully investigated this matter and, with the aid of the Bureau of Standards, has reached the conclusion that it is not only possible, but it is relatively a simple matter to test wool by sample at the time of importation. It is also ascertained that the machinery required for scouring and conditioning wool in small lots is inexpensive and could be promptly installed, and the cost of operation would be light. If Congress should deem it wise to adopt this method of collecting duties upon raw wool, it would seem that the details necessary for its prompt, efficient, and economical administration may safely be left to the proper administrative officers of the Government."

The President accepts this conclusion in these words, page 4:

"The board reports that this method is feasible in practice and could be administered without great expense."

This statement of the board is ambiguous. Of course it "is a simple matter to test wool by sample at the time of importation," but will the results of the test show the average shrinkage of the entire lot in each case? Like Glendower, the Tariff Board and Bureau of Standards can, of course, call spirits from the vasty deep. So can I or any other man, but will they come when we call? That is the question. To aid in reaching a conclusion as to whether the testing of imported grease wool to determine its shrinkage is feasible, let us consider some of the conditions under which it must be carried out.

DRAWING SAMPLES FOR THE TESTS.

The first difficulty to arise in testing the shrinkage of a lot of wool is the drawing of a sample to represent the entire lot. Wool as it comes from the sheep carries grease, dirt, dung, and other impurities which are removed by the scouring process. This shrinkage in scouring varies widely, not only in different fleeces, but in different parts of the same fleece. The grease wool, usually in separate fleeces, is packed in bales each weighing 180 to 1,000 pounds, and a cargo is made up of different lots varying from 1 bale to 200 bales or more in size. Take a lot of 100 bales. If a manufacturer wanted to test the shrinkage of such a lot before buying, he would buy and scour several, say, 2 to 5, bales selected as fair samples. Testing on such a scale is out of the question in the case of the Government. In a year like 1909 it would mean scouring from 3,500,000 to 9,000,000 pounds of wool. Not only is that impracticable, but it would mean a depreciation of 8 to 10 cents a pound in the market value of the wool so scoured, say, a loss of $350,000 to $900,000. On the other hand, if a small sample, say, 50 pounds, is tested the problem is how to draw 50 pounds from 30,000 pounds more or less so as to have the small quantity represent the entire lot. My belief is that it is impossible and that the small sample, even if drawn by an experienced, careful, and thoroughly honest man, would represent the large lot only by a rare chance.

LARGE NUMBER OF TESTS.

It would be necessary to make a separate test of each lot. The average size of the lots sold at London is about 10 bales. At that rate it would be necessary in a year like 1909 for the United States Government to make approximately 50,000 scouring tests of 50,000 lots of grease wool, or 167 tests per day. The size of this undertaking depends on the size of the test samples, and on that point the board says nothing.

VARIATIONS IN RESULTS OF TESTS.

Scouring tests vary frequently from 2 to 5 per cent or more. The conditioning process, which the Tariff Board recommends, offers no guaranty against such variation. Conditioning will guard against such variations due to the presence of moisture, but will not guard against the variations due to imperfect scouring.

DELAYS.

The testing of wool for shrinkage takes time. Add to this the accumulation of tests in a crowded season and the certainty of disputes involving retesting, the question of delay at the port of entry becomes serious for customs officers as well as for importers and manufacturers. The importer will not know what his wool is to cost him until it has been tested by the Government. This introduces an additional cause of uncertainty in a business already noted for its uncertain features.

DISPUTES.

The difficulties and impossibilities involved in the testing of grease wool in order to assess a duty on the scoured contents make it clear that every test will offer an excellent opportunity for a dispute between the Government and the importer as to the proper duty to be collected. This gives an added significance to the making of 50,000 tests a year.

ERROR AND FRAUD.

Under the conditions that surround a scoured-weight tariff on wool serious errors are certain to occur. In addition there is the opportunity for fraud, with but slight chance of detection and conviction. Fraud would be easy in drawing the samples and in handling the test lots. Concealment of guilt would be equally easy. The opportunities for defrauding the Government would be far greater with the scoured-weight tariff on wool than by undervaluation with an ad valorem duty, and the work of detection and conviction would be practically impossible.

RECOMMENDED IN DISREGARD OF EXPERIENCE.

The Tariff Board evades the practical difficulties involved in a specific tariff based on the scoured weight of wool by stating (p. 397) that "it would seem that the details necessary for its prompt, efficient, and economical administration may be safely left to the proper administrative officers of the Government." Prominence is given in the report to the indorsement of the practicability of such a tariff by the Bureau of Standards. But what the report fails to state is that, as I am informed on the highest authority, this scoured-weight tariff has been recommended by the Tariff Board in total disregard of the judgment of an administrative officer in the customs service who has had years of practical experience in the handling of wool, both as a dealer and as an official in the Government service. And the judgment of this official is in accord with that of all of the many experienced wool dealers with whom I have discussed this question. There is no escape from the conclusion that the proper administration of a tariff based on the scoured weight of grease wool is utterly impracticable.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH EXPERIENCE.

Reports have just been received from two men, one at Bradford, England, the other at Amiens, France, who at my request made an investigation of the conditioning process in their respective countries and obtained the opinions of men experienced in the management of conditioning houses. My Amiens correspondent says that "le conditionnement des laines à l'état brut ne se pratique que tres rarement." (Grease wool is rarely conditioned.) His statement is confirmed by the official statistics of the Roubaix and Tourcoing conditioning houses, which give the quantity of tops, yarn, and noils tested, but make no reference to scouring tests of grease wool.

My Bradford correspondent went into the subject in considerable detail, making a careful inspection of the processes at the Bradford conditioning house. He reports that in 1911 the Bradford establishment made 237,967 tests, representing 95,930,026 pounds of wool and goods, and that of these tests, 222,998 were for moisture and only 3,464 were "scours for fat and oils." Moreover, these 3,464 scouring tests included tops, noils, wastes, and yarns, the scourings of raw wool being comparatively insignificant.

Another fact of importance is that the wool samples are usually drawn by the submitting party and not by the representatives of the conditioning house, the latter thus taking no responsibility for the essential question as to whether the test lot represents the entire lot. Another point is that some of the scouring tests at Bradford require two days. The tests for moisture are made at Bradford with only 2 pounds drawn from each bag. A Bradford conditioning house manager with long experience told my correspondent that the only way he could suggest for obtaining fairly correct scouring tests of large lots of grease wool was to install full-sized scouring, drying, and air-cooling machinery and testing as many bales of each lot as might be considered necessary. And after this was done the grease left in the wool could be determined only by a chemical analysis. This is the judgment of men experienced in testing textile materials at Bradford, the most important wool-manufacturing center in the world. Against this we have the ambiguous statement, page 397, that "the Tariff Board has investigated the matter, with the aid of the Bureau of Standards, and has reached the conclusion that it is not only possible, but it is a relatively simple matter to test wool by sample at the time of importation."

I have made some inquiries regarding the conditioning of textiles by the Bureau of Standards, and am informed on the best authority that their work thus far has been mainly a study of methods, that the work has not progressed sufficiently to enable them to fix a definite schedule of fees for public service, that they are still working on the problem of sampling from large lots and have not decided on a standard method, and that the determination of the shrinkage of raw wool could be made on samples as large as 3 to 5 pounds. The bureau's work in conditioning textiles is still in its preliminary stage, and while it may in time reach a point where its officials will be able to report from experience on the practicability of administering a tariff based on the scoured weight of grease wool, it has not yet arrived there.

Although the statement of the Tariff Board just quoted is ambiguous, it is calculated to convey the idea that the shrinkage of large lots of grease wool can be easily determined. As such it is unfair to Congress and to all who desire a prompt and wise revision of Schedule K, and it is also unfair to the Bureau of Standards, whose officials, I am sure, would not indorse such a proposition.

My own experience, the statements made to me by many experienced wool dealers, the reports from Bradford and Amiens, and the information obtained regarding the work of conditioning by the Bureau of Standards at Washington all confirm the conclusion already reached that the plan to base specific tariff rates on the scoured weight of grease wool is hopelessly impossible.

IMPOSSIBLE AND UNDESIRABLE.

And for what purpose is it proposed to adopt the impossible scoured-weight proposition? Why, in order to establish a tariff system under which the inequalities would be far greater than they are now under the specific tariff on grease wool, whose serious defects are no longer denied.

CARPET WOOLS.

The recommendations of the board regarding wools of different classes are somewhat conflicting. They decided that the scoured basis should be adopted for wools of Class I and Class II, but when they faced the problem of carpet wool they concluded that the grease basis should be adopted. The report states, page 414:

"The objection hereinbefore conceded to lie against the flat specific on the scoured content, as in the case of Classes I and II, becomes in the case of this heterogeneous mixture of grades, qualities, and values a much more serious one."

The objection to which the board refers and which has already been quoted is, page 397:

Objection is made to a flat rate upon the scoured pound on the ground that it would not be fair to subject wools of varying value to a uniform rate of duty. It must be conceded that there is some reason in this."

As a matter of fact, the scoured values of wools of Class I and Class II vary far more than do the scoured values of carpet wools, so this objection applies with less force to carpet wools than to the others, although a scoured-weight tariff is undesirable for wools of any class. The board suggests, page 414, that—

"This problem might be settled by a single specific rate, regardless of either value or condition, as meeting best the problems of administration and revenue, and at least relieving the carpet trade of much of the uncertainty inherent in the present system."

This recommendation of a flat specific rate on carpet wool can easily be subjected to the acid test by applying any such rate, say 7 cents a pound, to the different grades. A list of these grades was obtained from one of the leading dealers in carpet wools, with the approximate prices on March 15, 1912. The list follows, with the ad valorem equivalents of a 7-cent specific rate:

This is the operation of the tariff recommended by the board for carpet wool. The rates vary from 29 to 88 per cent ad valorem, the highest being 200 per cent above the lowest. Comment would seem to be unnecessary. In fact, it was hardly necessary to test the board's recommendation, as it is now well known that a specific duty on a material varying as widely in condition and value as wool does is indefensible.

The board's recommendation of one rate for so-called carpet wools and a very different rate for all other wools is seriously objectionable because of the impossibility of classifying wools according to the uses to which they are to be put. Under the present classification of the Payne bill a large quantity of wool is imported at a low duty as class III (carpet) wool and used in the manufacture of goods other than carpeting. This is admitted in the report, page 413:

"These wools (class III) are chiefly used in the manufacture of carpets and rugs, but an inquiry by the board develops the fact that, while the great bulk of the consumption is devoted to such use, certain grades are in demand for other purposes, such as the manufacture of felt boots, horse blankets, coarse upholstery goods, robes, paper maker's felt aprons, and wadding for gun cartridges. The better grades also find their way into various blends in the manufacture of coarse cloths, such as the cheaper grades of cloakings, overcoatings, coarse tweeds and cheviots, and occasionally into worsted-spinning mills.

"The truth seems to be that the demand for the so-called carpet wools for better than carpet-making purposes depends largely upon the price of clothing wools."

So it will be with any reasonable classification intended to admit carpet wools at a rate different from that placed on other wools. It follows that under such an arrangement the manufacturers using so-called carpet wools for goods other than carpets will obtain an advantage over other manufacturers making competing goods from wool subject to the higher duty.

COMPENSATORY DUTIES.

The report devotes much space to the compensatory duty on goods made wholly of wool and on pages 621 to 626 gives a detailed account of how this duty could be adjusted to provide compensation for a specific tariff based on the scoured weight of wool. The shrinkage of wool in the various processes of manufacturing and the value of the various by-products from noils to shear flocks are calculated with apparent exactitude. To provide compensation the rate per scoured pound of wool is increased 10 per cent when applied to tops, by 19 per cent when applied to yarn, and by 42 per cent when applied to cloth. All this leaves the impression that here we have a method by which compensation for the compensatory tariff can be adjusted to the duty on wool with scientific accuracy. This method, however, is based on the false assumption that the cost of the raw material in wool goods is increased by exactly the amount of specific duty imposed on imported wool. But this is not the case. The specific duty, bearing no uniform relation to the value of the wool, restricts the supply of different grades unequally. A new, unstable, and usually higher price level is established behind such a tariff. And the difference between the domestic and the foreign price of wool is nearly always less than the tariff on the wool imported. That has been the rule under the various wool tariffs since 1867. The last three years have supplied a striking illustration of it, for during a considerable part of that time the domestic price of wool has been but little above the foreign price, although a specific duty has been in force with ad valorem equivalents varying from 35 to 550 per cent.

This would be the condition under a specific duty based on the scoured weight of wool for which the Tariff Board has calculated a compensatory duty with such seeming accuracy. Suppose that the 30,644 bales of scoured wool already referred to are offered for sale in foreign markets and that a duty of 20 cents per scoured pound is in force in this country. The American manufacturer would run his eye down the list and find that on 26,419 bales, or 86 per cent of the entire quantity, the duty varied from 50 to 333 per cent ad valorem; that on 4,918 bales the duty varied from 100 to 333 per cent; and that the average duty for the entire 30,644 bales would be 67 per cent ad valorem. This would mean that the low-priced wools were excluded from the country and that the only wools available for importation were those of the best quality and highest price adapted for high-priced fabrics.

NO COMPENSATION FOR EXCLUSION OF RAW MATERIALS.

The manufacturer would thus be forced to use such substitutes as were offered for sale in the United States, such as the limited quantity of low-grade wools, shoddy, wool by-products, and cotton. Under these conditions the compensatory duty framed by the Tariff Board would be but a mockery. No tariff on goods can compensate a manufacturer for a duty which deprives him of raw material. With a duty of 20 cents per scoured pound, wool costing abroad 25 cents a pound scoured would cost 45 cents duty paid. The Tariff Board says: Put a specific duty of 22 cents a pound on tops, 23¾ cents a pound on yarn, and 28½ cents a pound on goods to compensate the American manufacturer for this 20-cent duty on wool. But the trouble with this plan is that the business will not stand the 20-cent rate. The foreign prices of different grades of wool are determined by their respective adaptability for supplying the wants of consumers. When specific duties interfere with the extension of such natural adjustment of values to the United States, the result is not, as the Tariff Board assumes, a uniform increase in the American market by the amount of the specific duty. Such interference results, instead, in a new adjustment based on the adaptability of the restricted American supply of raw materials for supplying the wants of American consumers. And it is these conditions that the American manufacturer must meet. He must make his goods out of low-priced materials in order to sell them at prices the consumer can pay. The so-called compensatory of 28½ cents a pound becomes under such conditions largely protective and thus the scoured weight duty leaves us just where we are now, with low-priced raw materials excluded from the country and the tariff on goods largely in excess of requirements because of the concealed protection in the compensatory duties.

PROTECTIVE DUTIES ON WOOL MANUFACTURES.

That part of the report dealing with protective duties on partly and wholly manufactured goods is confused and conflicting. Great emphasis is placed on what the board considers to be the serious defects of ad valorem duties, the following from page 709 being a typical passage:

"One serious disadvantage of ad valorem duties is that the amount of duty increases with every increase in the price of the article. In other words, at the time when prices are high and when the consumer would be most benefited by the active competition of foreign fabrics, the duty automatically increases. Conversely, the amount of duty diminishes when prices fall; that is, when the consumer least needs relief and when the competition of foreign manufacturers is most injurious to the home producer."

The report then goes on to point out the supposed advantages of specific duties and the disadvantages of an ad valorem tariff for purposes of protection, page 709:

"From the point of view of protecting the domestic manufacturer by equalizing the difference in cost of production at home and abroad by means of tariff duties, the system of specific duties is the natural and logical method. Market values fluctuate continuously, according to the prices of the raw material. The cost of manufacturing this material, however, remains relatively constant and does not change with such fluctuations; that is, the difference in the cost of production is a relatively constant quantity, and consequently a duty assessed in ad valorem terms would inevitably be at one time in excess of the difference in the cost of production and at another time less than the difference in the cost of production, according to the temporary and speculative changes of the market."

Then the report condemns specific duties for goods with a saving clause for yarn, pages 709 and 710:

"The successful operation of a system of specific duties, however, depends upon the possibility of classifying the articles on which duties are levied in definite terms familiar to the trade and corresponding to actual difference in cost of manufacture. Many efforts have been made to find an accurate basis for such classification for manufactures of wool, but thus far not with success so far as woven fabrics are concerned. In the case of yarns the problem is relatively simple. Yarns are comparatively well standardized and their cost varies in a certain regular relation to the fineness or count of the yarn. It is a simple matter, then, to adopt the specific system in this particular case. A duty can be assessed on No. 1 yarn and be made to increase by a certain proportion with each additional count of yarn. The proper additions could, furthermore, be made for doubling, dyeing, hard twisting, etc.

"But no satisfactory method of classifying woven fabrics, in the case of manufactures of wool with a view to the assessments of specific duties, has yet been devised."

These conclusions, if accepted as final, deprive us of any satisfactory basis for protective duties, but the report supplies this want on page 710 by adopting the ad valorem system which it had so severely condemned on page 709:

"It would seem, then, that in so far as woolen and worsted fabrics are concerned the only present practicable method of levying duties is to adopt in some measure a system of ad valorem duties. Such ad valorem duties would necessarily be in addition to any compensatory duties levied because of the duty on the raw material."

It is difficult to understand the state of mind in which a system of protective duties is condemned on one page and then adopted on the next without referring to the objections previously stated or adopting any measures whatever to overcome them. The market fluctuations which made an ad valorem tariff on goods so objectionable and so burdensome to the consumer on page 709 would have exactly the same effect under the stepladder ad valorem duties recommended on page 710.

RAW MATERIAL AND MANUFACTURING COSTS.

Without wasting time in further consideration of the contradictory reasoning of the Tariff Board, let us look at their recommendations regarding protective duties, page 18:

"There are grave difficulties, however, in attempting to place a flat ad valorem rate on manufactures of this kind. In certain grades of fabrics the value of the material is a very large proportion of the total value and the cost of the manufacture relatively small. In the case of expensive and finely finished goods, on the other hand, the cost of material becomes less important and the labor or conversion cost becomes an increasingly large proportion of the total cost. The result is that a flat rate adequate to offset the difference in cost of production on the finer goods must be prohibitive on cheaper goods. Conversely, the rate which merely equalizes the difference in cost of production on cheaper goods would be inadequate to equalize the difference in the cost of finer goods. A fair solution seems to be the adoption of a graduated scale under which an ad valorem rate, assessed properly on goods of low value, should then increase progressively, according to slight increments of value, up to whatever maximum rate should be fixed."

This recommendation is also found in the President's message, page 6:

"No flat ad valorem rate on such fabrics can be made to work fairly and effectively. Any single rate which is high enough to equalize the difference in manufacturing cost at home and abroad on highly finished goods, involving such labor, would be prohibitory on cheaper goods, in which the labor cost is a smaller proportion of the total value. Conversely, a rate only adequate to equalize this difference on cheaper goods would remove protection from the fine-goods manufacture, the increase in which has been one of the striking features of the trade's development in recent years. I therefore recommend that in any revision the importance of a graduated scale of ad valorem duties on cloths be carefully considered and applied."

The President and the Tariff Board are mistaken in their assumption that the cost of manufacturing is less on low-priced fabrics than on high-priced goods. This is not in accordance with mill experience. To show what the truth is regarding the proportions of raw material and manufacturing in the cost of different grades of wool goods, the figures for 86 fabrics made at the Merchants Woolen Mill, Dedham, Mass., during the two years four and one-half months from December, 1891, are given below:

These cost figures refute the contention of the President and the Tariff Board as to the proportion of the cost of manufacturing to the total cost of low and high priced wool goods. Of these 86 fabrics the 43 lowest priced cloths show an average manufacturing cost of 46.1 per cent. The 43 highest priced show an average manufacturing cost of 40.2 per cent. The general principle to be drawn from these particulars is the opposite of that formulated by the President and the board. There is a slight preponderance of manufacturing cost in the total cost of the low-priced goods.

THE BOARD'S RECOMMENDATIONS IN CONFLICT WITH THE BOARD'S STATISTICS.

The indorsement by the President and the board of the opposite claim is the more remarkable because it conflicts not only with mill experience but with the cost estimates which the board gives on pages 651 to 690. The form in which these estimates appear is misleading, because the cost of the raw material and the cost of manufacturing this material into yarn are not given separately, but are both included in the single item of yarn cost. This may explain why the board formulated a general principle which was in conflict with its own figures. On 42 of the samples listed on pages 651 to 690 I have calculated the cost of converting the raw stock into yarn, using as far as possible the data which the board gives. This conversion cost of yarn has been added to the board's estimate for converting the yarn into cloth, and thus we arrive at the board's estimate of the cost of raw material and the cost of manufacturing, which are given in percentages in the following table along with the cost per pound of cloth:

These figures do not give the slightest support to the claim advanced by the President and the Tariff Board that the proportionate cost of manufacturing increases with the total cost of the goods. On the contrary, the board's own cost estimates show that the proportionate cost of manufacturing is greatest on the cheapest goods. The 21 lowest priced fabrics show an average manufacturing cost of 45½ per cent, while the average of the remaining 21 highest priced cloths is 43 per cent. Thus we find that starting with a false assumption regarding the cost of manufacturing the Tariff Board recommends a system of stepladder ad valorem duties on goods (p. 710):

"In general it may be said that the fabrics of high value have a relatively high conversion cost. There are, of course, individual exceptions to this general statement, but they are not of sufficient importance to materially affect the case. Consequently, if the purpose of legislation be to adjust duties so far as possible to relative labor or conversion costs, this can now best be done, so far as woolen and worsted fabrics are concerned, by assessing ad valorem rates and have them vary with the value of fabric. A system of graduated duties, increasing regularly with different increments of value, could be made equitably to equalize the difference in cost of production on the more expensive fabrics without placing prohibitory rates on fabrics of lower grades."

Mill experience and the board's own figures stamp the premise as wrong and the recommendation as unsound. If protective ad valorem rates on wool goods are to be varied at all with the value of the fabric, the highest rates should be placed on the lowest priced goods. As a matter of fact, however, the relative proportions of raw material and manufacturing making up the cost of wool goods of different values are fairly uniform and the variations so slight that one flat ad valorem rate answers well for protective purposes.

An additional fact of interest bearing on this question of the relative proportions of material and manufacturing expense is found in the cost of the carded woolen goods made in the Hecla mill, Uxbridge, Mass., from December 31, 1886, to October 31, 1891. The total cost of the goods was $1,343,076.47. Of this amount $795,996.02, or 59.3 per cent, was the cost of the wool, while the remainder, $547,080.45, or 40.7 per cent, covered all other expenses of manufacturing. While these Uxbridge figures have no direct bearing on the claim advanced by the President and the board as to the variation of these proportions in the cost of low and high priced goods, they do show that the average at the Hecla mill corresponds approximately with the results obtained at Dedham, where the average for the 86 fabrics was 56.8 per cent for raw material and 43.2 per cent for manufacturing. The item of raw material in both cases covers only the cost of the materials, wool, cotton, and by-products, converted into cloth, while all other expenses, including such materials as fuel, soap, and dyestuffs, are included in the cost of manufacturing.

AD VALOREM DUTIES.

The report of the Tariff Board is emphatic in condemnation of ad valorem duties on wool, the objections being summarized in the following extracts:

Page 4: "These discriminations could be overcome by assessing a duty in ad valorem terms, but this method is open to the objection, first, that it increases administrative difficulties and tends to decrease revenue through undervaluation; and, second, that as prices advance, the ad valorem rate increases the duty per pound at the time when the consumer most needs relief and the producer can best stand competition, while if prices decline the duty is decreased at the time when the consumer is least burdened by the price and the producer most needs protection.

Page 11: "The board finds that an ad valorem is open to grave objection from the point of view of administration and revenue, in the case of a crude, bulky commodity like wool, produced in many remote regions and finding its way into the markets through so many various channels of trade.

"That, furthermore, an ad valorem rate would give a high duty per pound when prices were high; that is, when the consumer most needs relief and the producer is most able to bear competition. With a low price of wool the duty per pound would be low; that is, at the time when the consumer has less need of competing wools and the producer is least able to bear competition."

If these two objections to ad valorem duties are sound in respect to wool, they have even greater force when a tariff on manufactured goods is considered. The value of raw wool is easily determined, whereas the appraisal of manufactured goods is difficult. Moreover, if the evil effects of fluctuating prices, over which the President and the Tariff Board express so much concern in the case of wool, are not imaginary, they will certainly be far more serious in the case of manufactured goods, because the protective duty on goods involves not only the protection of the woolgrower but of the wool manufacturer as well. And yet the President and the board unite in recommending an ad valorem duty for goods, where all of their objections, if valid, have the greatest force. If they are right in recommending an ad valorem duty for goods, they are wrong in condemning it for raw wool. No part of this contradictory report and the message accompanying it excites more surprise than the condemnation of ad valorem duties for raw material and the approval of such duties for manufactured goods.

THE BURDEN OF SPECIFIC RATES.

Equally surprising is the manner in which the report and the message ignore the serious objections to a specific duty on a material varying in value as widely as scoured wool. In the preceding pages of this analysis are illustrations of these variations. A typical example is supplied by the 30,644 bales of scoured wool sold at London last July, which showed ad valorem equivalents of a 20-cent rate per scoured pound, varying from 33 per cent on the highest-priced lot to 333 per cent on the lowest priced. The President and the board unite in recommending a wool duty subject to such burdensome inequalities, at the same time condemning a uniform ad valorem rate because of the possibility of undervaluations which could not exceed 5 per cent without gross official negligence. Suppose that under an ad valorem tariff two vessels laden with wool should reach an American port, each carrying 3,000 bales, 900,000 pounds scoured weight, of wool; that the wool in one vessel was valued at $216,000 and in the other at $432,000. A fair method of taxing this wool would make the tax on the low-priced cargo one-half of that imposed on the other, which is worth twice as much. It would unquestionably be a great injustice to collect the same tax, say $108,000, on each cargo. That would be like taxing real estate at so much per parcel, instead of so much per thousand dollars of valuation. It would increase the cost of one cargo by 50 per cent and the cost of the other by only 25 per cent. It would be injustice, discrimination, and special privilege. And yet it is exactly that objectionable system which the President and the Tariff Board recommend for the duty on wool. And one of the reasons for their recommendation is the possibility, under a straight ad valorem tariff, of a variation due to undervaluation that could not exceed 5 per cent if the administrative officers did their duty.

Another serious objection to specific duties which the President and the board ignore when advising a specific duty on wool is the heavy burden it places on low-priced materials suited for consumers of low purchasing power, while the high-priced goods that go to consumers of high purchasing power escape with a light duty. This analysis is filled with illustrations of this particular evil, to which the President and the Tariff Board are apparently indifferent in their zeal for a specific tariff based on the scoured weight of wool. The objection to an ad valorem duty because of the fluctuation of market values deserves little consideration. Price fluctuations comparable to the fluctuations of the ad valorem equivalents, which we have seen to be certain under specific duties, are unthinkable. The ordinary fluctuations of prices offer no serious difficulties to either producer or consumer in connection with an ad valorem tariff. Prices do change, like all other things, and with an ad valorem tariff the duty collected will change in harmony with them. And it is only by an ad valorem tariff that the injustice of collecting a fixed tax regardless of value, as under the present tariff on wool, can be avoided. Moreover, if a protective tariff is to be adjusted to the difference in the cost of production between this country and abroad, the value is the only proper basis for the rates.

ADVANTAGES OF AD VALOREM RATES.

I have already shown the practical uniformity of the proportions of material and manufacturing costs that make up the total cost of different fabrics, and which show how well an ad valorem basis is suited for a tariff based on the manufacturing cost. Moreover, the cost of partly manufactured products increases with each process. The value increases with each step in manufacturing, thus automatically apportioning and adjusting the basis of the tariff to the protective requirements. For example, if wool is converted into worsted cloth the total value of the wool is divided, part of it being represented by the value of the by-products at the successive stages of manufacturing and the remainder being combined with the manufacturing cost to make up the total cost of the cloth. Eliminating profits, the market value of the cloth and by-products thus provides the basis for the proper protective-tariff rates. And the practical uniformity of the proportions of raw material and manufacturing in the cost of cloths makes the value the best basis for the compensatory duty.

There is another important point in this connection. Let us assume that there is an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent on wool, and that the American cost of manufacturing is twice the foreign cost. As the proportions of raw material in different fabrics are, with few exceptions, found to vary between 50 and 65 per cent, we will take for illustration two cloths of which one represents a foreign cost per yard made up of 50 cents for wool and 50 cents for manufacturing, while the cost of the other per yard consists of 65 cents for wool and 35 cents for manufacturing. To equalize the foreign and domestic costs of these two fabrics the following duties would be necessary:

	Foreign cost.	Difference.	American cost.
NO. 1 CLOTH.
Wool	$0.50	$0.20	$0.70
Manufacturing	.50	.50	1.00
	1.00	.70	1.70
NO. 2 CLOTH.
Wool	.65	.26	.91
Manufacturing	.35	.35	.70
	1.00	.61	1.61

This shows that, while the difference in the cost of manufacturing varies 15 cents a yard, the difference in the total cost duty paid varies only 9 cents per yard. For that reason a flat ad valorem rate of 70 per cent on goods would, in extreme cases, exceed the required protection by only 5 per cent. This is a negligible difference when compared with the extreme variations under a specific tariff, which have been such powerful factors in arousing public sentiment against not only the Payne bill but the policy of protection itself.

A TARIFF BILL "IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE REPORT."

I have endeavored to confine the foregoing analysis to the more important features of the Tariff Board's report on Schedule K. This has resulted in the omission of reference to a number of points which, though deserving attention, are of comparatively minor importance. The Hill bill (H. R. 22262) for revising Schedule K has recently been introduced into the House of Representatives, and as its author, Mr. HILL, announced that it was in accordance with the report of the Tariff Board, a brief examination of this measure may not be out of place here, affording, as it will, an opportunity to illustrate the practical application of various recommendations in the report.

THE HILL TARIFF ON WOOL.

The Hill bill provides for a specific duty of 18 cents a pound on the scoured weight of grease wool. The difference between this rate and the rate (20 cents a pound) which is used in this analysis to illustrate the operation of a scoured-weight duty on wool is so slight that my previous comments on this feature of the board's report can be applied to the wool duties on the Hill bill. Take, for example, the 30,644 bales of scoured wool sold at London last year. The 20-cent rate made the highest ad valorem equivalent 333 per cent, the lowest 33 per cent, and the average 67 per cent. The Hill rate of 18 cents would make the highest ad valorem equivalent 300 per cent, the lowest 29 per cent, and the average 60½ per cent. The proportionate variation is the same in both cases; the reduction would be of negligible value to either manufacturer or consumer. The Payne rate on scoured wool is 33 cents a pound, giving on the scoured wool above named extremes of 550 and 54 per cent, the three rates showing the following comparison:

	Hill, 18 cents.	20 cents.	Payne, 33 cents.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
High	300	333	550
Low	29½	33	54
Average	60½	67	111

BY-PRODUCTS.

The Hill rates on wool by-products are as follows:

"Top waste and slubbing waste, 18 cents per pound; roving waste and ring waste, 14 cents per pound; noils, carbonized, 14 cents per pound; noils, not carbonized, 11 cents per pound; garnetted waste, 11 cents per pound; thread waste, yarn waste, and wool wastes not specified, 9½ cents per pound; shoddy, mungo, and wool extract, 8 cents per pound; woolen rags and flocks, 2 cents per pound."

All that has so far been said regarding the inequalities and burdens resulting from specific duties on wool and wool goods applies with special force to such duties on wool by-products, the use of which is essential to the proper clothing of people living in temperate and cold climates. The operation of the Hill duties on by-products is illustrated by applying them to the 42 samples of noils, waste, and shoddy to which reference was made in Senate Document No. 38, Sixty-first Congress, first session. This illustration is conservative, because by-products will be found in the market both higher and lower in price than any on this list:

The Hill rates appear moderate compared with the Payne duties, but for nearly all the materials in the list the former would have the same effect as the latter—exclusion.

WORSTED TOPS.

In order to show how the Hill rates on worsted tops would operate I have calculated the ad valorem equivalents of both the Hill and Payne rates for eight grades of tops ranging from the highest to the lowest sold at Bradford, England, the prices being for March 15, 1912. The results follow:

Name.	Price, cents per pound.	Ad valorem equivalent.
		Hill.	Payne.
		Per cent.	Per cent.
40s Colonial	26½	80	163
44s Colonial	28	76	161
50s Colonial	34	64	138
56s Colonial	39	56	124
60s Colonial	48½	46	105
70s Colonial	52	43	100
80s Colonial	54	42	97
90s Colonial	60	38	91

Here again we see the irregularity of ad valorem equivalents and the heaviest burden on the lowest-priced materials that always result from specific duties. The Payne rates on worsted tops are all prohibitory. The Hill rates would be prohibitory on low-priced tops and under certain conditions of domestic supply and demand would probably permit of a limited importation of high-priced tops. The Hill duty on tops is made up of a specific duty of 20 cents, called the compensatory duty, and a protective duty of 5 per cent ad valorem. This division is only nominal. On low and medium priced tops the specific duty would fail to compensate for the exclusion of the low-priced wools of which such tops are made.

YARN.

Under the Hill bill yarns would be subject to a duty of 21½ cents per pound and an additional ad valorem rate graded according to value as follows:

	Per cent ad valorem.
30 cents and under	10
30 to 50 cents	15
50 to 80 cents	20
Above 80 cents	25

The Tariff Board's recommendation that the protective duty on goods be ad valorem and increase with the value of the goods in order to protect the supposed greater proportionate cost of manufacturing high-priced goods has been adopted in framing the Hill tariff on yarn. I have shown that that assumption is incorrect. The progressive increase in the Hill protective rates is consequently unwarranted. The specific rate of 21½ cents per pound, giving the highest ad valorem equivalent on the lowest-priced yarns, serves in some measure to correct the inequalities resulting from the progressive increase of the ad valorem rate. This correction is only partial, however, as is shown by the Hill ad valorem equivalents on 13 grades of worsted yarn quoted at Bradford, England, on March 15, 1912:

Name.	Price per pound.	Ad valorem equivalent.
		Hill.	Payne.
		Per cent.	Per cent.
2/16s crossbred (32s)	$0.32	82	160
2/15s 3-ply carpet	.34	78	153
2/32s crossbred (40s)	.37	73	145
2/36s crossbred (44s)	.40	69	136
2/40s crossbred (46s)	.44	64	128
2/20s crossbred (50s)	.48	60	120
2/20s crossbred (56s)	.54	60	111
2/48s crossbred (58s)	.65	53	99
1/60s Botany super (64s)	.72	50	93
2/60s crossbred (70s)	.77	48	90
2/48s twist (64s)	.82	51	87
2/40s medium mohair	.84	50	86
1/30s super mohair	1.16	43	73

The irregularity of rates and preponderance of duty on low-priced materials, with which we have become familiar, are illustrated again by the application of the Hill and Payne rates on these worsted yarns. The list fails to show the full extent of the irregularity, however, because it does not include the low-priced carded woolen yarns made of mixtures of wool and by-products.

TARIFF ON CLOTHS.

The Hill bill imposes a compound duty on cloths, knit goods, and felts. The specific rate is 25 cents per pound on goods valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, and 26 cents on goods valued at more than 40 cents. The ad valorem rates are graduated according to value as follows:

	Per cent ad valorem.
Not over 40 cents	30
40 to 60 cents	35
60 to 80 cents	40
80 cents to $1	45
$1 to $1.50	50
Over $1.50	55

These rates, so far as they apply to felts and knit goods, are not in accordance with the report of the Tariff Board, for the board made no report on these goods. The limitation of the specific rates to the wool contained in the goods is, in the case of cloths as well as yarn, in disregard of the opinions of the Tariff Board, page 626:

"Goods made with a cotton warp and wool weft may be easily recognized and rated; but it frequently happens that both warp and weft contain more or less of cheaper materials. There are, of course, well known and simple tests for discovering the cotton content of a fabric, but their application to imported cloths in the customhouse would involve considerable difficulties. Moreover, there is no test known that will disclose the proportion of noils, shoddy, mungo, etc., to new wool in many varieties of fabrics. Difficulties of this kind, however, could be partly overcome by graduating the compensatory duty according to the value of the fabric."

The Hill bill evidently contemplated confining the specific duty to the wool fiber in a fabric, regardless of whether the fiber was new wool, wool by-products, or reclaimed wool. The 25-cent rate on goods valued at not more than 40 cents per pound is but a pretense of accepting the graduated compensatory duty recommended by the board, because the reduction of 1 cent a pound from the regular rate is negligible, so far as the professed object is concerned.

The sliding scale of ad valorem duties is in accordance with the recommendation of the Tariff Board. We have seen that this recommendation is based on a false assumption regarding the proportionate cost of manufacturing goods of different values. If 55 per cent ad valorem is required for protection on goods valued at more than $1.50 per pound, that rate is necessary on goods valued at less than $1.50 per pound.

In order to illustrate the operation of the Hill rates on different grades of cloths and to afford a comparison with the Payne rates, I have calculated the ad valorem equivalent of the Hill and Payne rates for 34 fabrics, 17 of which are taken from the report, pages 660, 704, and 705:

The limitation of the Hill specific duty to the wool content of the cloth has resulted in a marked decrease of the ad valorem equivalents on the 11 fabrics containing cotton. The list, however, exhibits the same general features that were evident in the case of partly manufactured goods, namely, wide variations and the highest rates on goods of the lowest price, these being the results of the flat specific rate. These 34 fabrics do not include samples of that important class of low-priced goods made of mixtures of wool and wool by-products. On such goods the full Hill specific rate would apply and, by reason of the low valuation and excess of the compensatory duty, ad valorem equivalents higher than any shown in the above list would be the result. The Hill tariff on blankets is based on a system of compound duties similar to those on cloths, so the criticism of the latter applies equally well to the former.

CARPET WOOL.

The Hill bill provides for a specific duty of 7 cents a pound on carpet wool imported in the grease, and 19 cents if imported scoured. We have already applied this rate—7 cents—to the carpet wools grown throughout the world, and that application will illustrate the effect of the Hill rate on carpet wool. These wools are light shrinking, so the effect of the Hill rate on carpet wool of 19 cents a pound scoured would be to prohibit the importation of such wool in the scoured condition. The bill also provides that 99 per cent of the duty on carpet wool shall be refunded to the producer who uses such wools in the manufacture of carpets, rugs, and similar goods, the intention being to give the carpet manufacturers free wool. The bill provides that:

"Such drawback shall be paid under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

This drawback provision would certainly be impossible of administration. It is impossible for any manufacturer to trace the wool through the mill and give proof that it has been converted into certain goods. Moreover, there are mills making carpet yarn for sale. How could the wool in such yarn be traced from spinner to dealer, from dealer to dealer, and from dealer or spinner to the weaver, and then through the weaving mill where it becomes inextricably mixed with other materials, wool, linen, hemp, jute, cotton? Again there are spinners making yarn from both carpet and other wools, which would add a new element of uncertainty to a task already impossible. Part of a lot of yarn may be converted into carpets and rugs and the remainder be held indefinitely in the form of yarn. And the by-products, how are these to be traced to their final destination in a carpet or into cloth for other purposes? This drawback plan to give the carpet manufacturer free wool does not deserve serious consideration.

CARPETS AND RUGS.

The Hill bill provides for rugs an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent; for carpets, 30 per cent. These rates are in disregard of the recommendation of the President and the Tariff Board that ad valorem rates, increasing as the value increases, should be adopted in order to provide adequate protection for the supposed higher proportionate cost of manufacturing high-priced goods. And these straight ad valorem rates, according to the evidence I have submitted, are the best form of a tariff on wool goods, whether the object is to provide compensation for a duty on the raw material or protection against a lower cost of manufacturing abroad.

In order to compare the Hill and Payne rates I have calculated the ad valorem equivalents on five grades of English carpets, with the results following:

Grade.	Price per yard, 27 inches wide.	Ad valorem equivalent.
		Hill.	Payne.
		Per cent.	Per cent.
A 417 tapestry Brussels	$0.30	30	110
A 416 tapestry Brussels	.50	30	82
A 415 stout Brussels	.60	30	95
A 414 best Brussels	.90	30	77
A 413 super Wilton	1.40	30	72

The irregularity of the Payne rates, with the highest duty on the lowest-priced goods, are features of the Payne equivalents, the effect of the specific duties per square yard, whereas the Hill rates are uniform, bearing equally on all grades in proportion to their respective values.

In conclusion I desire to express my keen regret at having found the statements of fact in the report deficient and the conclusions generally erroneous. The Tariff Board's work on Schedule K may, nevertheless, serve a useful purpose by awakening interest in a question of great importance, provided the real character of the investigation is clearly understood.

BOSTON, MASS., April 27, 1912.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement before voting upon the conference report. When the Payne-Aldrich bill was under consideration here in the Senate, I felt that one of the most grievous mistakes made in connection with that legislation was in omitting to revise and to reduce the woolen schedule. I privately importuned my friends in the Senate to the right and to the left to permit us to make a reduction of that schedule, but, as we all know, we were unable to effect a reduction. A year ago when the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was under consideration, if my memory serves me aright, I voted for his bill in the first instance. I think the ad valorem rate, if I remember rightly, on wool provided by that bill was 35 per cent. I will ask the Senator if I am not correct that that was the rate as the bill originally passed?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As the bill passed the Senate the ad valorem rate on wool was 35 per cent. The Senator from Minnesota is correct in that.

Mr. NELSON. That is my recollection. I voted for the bill in that form, but when the conference report came in reducing the rate, as it does at this time, I voted against it because I thought the reduction was too great. When the bill was under consideration at the present session of the Senate I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I voted for it for two reasons: First, because I believed it was based on the correct principle; that is, the principle of specific duties as opposed to ad valorem duties. In the next place I felt that it effected a reasonable and just reduction. When that amendment failed I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I voted for that amendment because I felt that it was based on the right principle, although I did not think it made as great a reduction as it ought to have made. If I could secure legislation to suit me I would have such legislation as that proposed by the Senator from Iowa. That, to my mind, provided a fair and just reduction and it was based on the correct principle. I will not enter into any extensive argument, but, in my opinion, the great vice of the plan proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is that the duties are based upon the value of the wool, and the value of wool is affected and goes up and down with the price in the foreign market. In round numbers, about one-third of the wool used in this country is imported, and the price of that imported wool, to a large extent, governs the price of our domestic wool. As that price goes up and down, as it ebbs and flows, so will this ad valorem duty ebb and flow, and there will be no certainty in it as there would be if a specific duty were provided.

I do not care to go into any further argument on this point. These are my views. While I am strongly in favor of reducing the wool tariff, I can not vote for this conference report, first, because I believe it is founded on a bad principle; that is, on the principle of ad valorem duties as against specific duties; and, in the next place, the reduction provided is too great, and it is unjust and unfair to the farmers and wool raisers of this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has expressed the views that I was going to express in the Senate much better than I can. I feel, however, that I should like to go on record as stating practically the same thing that he has stated, and that I voted, as he did, for the Cummins amendment and also for the committee amendment. I voted for the Cummins amendment because I believed it represented the most careful, conscientious, and scientific review of this subject that has been presented since the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich bill. It occurred to me that we could adopt that provision and be in harmony with the report of the Tariff Board; not that I am particular about being in harmony with it, but because it occurs to me that that is the clearest and best determination of the facts upon which to base a revision that could be, or at least that has been, presented to Congress. It is for this reason that I shall vote against the conference report; and I am sorry that the Cummins amendment could not have been the measure presented to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, my own view of the matter as it now stands before the Senate is that the reduction is below the protective point, and I shall vote against it for that reason.

There is another view that has not been fully expressed here in reference to ad valorem duties. It has already been suggested that under such a system the duty will rise as the wool advances in value, and that it will fall as the wool decreases in value. Mr. President, if the producers of wool need any protection they need it at the time when wool is the lowest in value, and at that time under an ad valorem system they will receive the least amount of protection. If there is any time when they do not need protection, it is when the price of wool is highest, and at that time under an ad valorem duty they will receive the greatest protection. Therefore, measuring the bill by the standard of what is necessary as a protective measure, it seems to me to be an unscientific method of levying a tariff.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I recognize the pressure on the time of the Senate, and do not myself want to enter into any debate or to do anything to provoke debate. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to have printed in the RECORD certain passages from the report of the Tariff Board bearing on ad valorem rates, the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, and some data which I have compiled bearing on the question of specific and ad valorem rates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the papers indicated by him may be printed in the RECORD without being read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In the article "Zölle, Zollwesen," by Max von Heckel, in the latest edition of Conrad's "Handwörterbuch des Staatswissenschaften," it is held that the technical accomplishment of the assessment of duties according to the value of the merchandise is attended only with greatest difficulty. The declarations of the persons responsible are not always reliable, and the customs authorities are only seldom able to correct their deficiencies. The regulations and other precautionary measures promulgated are, as a rule, ineffective. Specific duties are easier, simpler, and cheaper to collect, cause less burden on commerce, less drudgery and litigation, give less inducement to frauds, and can be easily collected at a great many customs stations.

Say's "Dictionnaire des Finances" states under the caption "Droits ad valorem":

"For the application of a specific tariff nothing is easier than the weighing of merchandise, the gauging of casks, the counting of the heads of a flock. But it is altogether another thing to set the value of a product. The authors of the treaty of 1860 and of later agreements took such good account of this difficulty that in instituting the valuation for determining the disputes which arise between customs and commerce they stipulated that wrong valuations declared by experts would not warrant penalties when they amounted to less than 10 per cent. They admitted, also, that there are men who manufacture and sell goods who might make errors in their calculations of 10 per cent. What can be expected of a mere fiscal agent whose ability is necessarily less extensive?

"The experience which the French customs service had with ad valorem tariffs from 1860 to 1880 demonstrated that this system, while it is seductive in theory, is unsatisfactory in practice. More than any other system it encourages frauds because of the difficulty of recognizing inaccuracies in declarations. It robs the treasury, which is deprived of a part of the customs dues; it causes injury to honest merchants, whom it involves in litigation, and tends to dishonest competition on the part of unscrupulous traders. It is only advantageous to the fraudulently inclined."

Under the heading "Ad valorem duty," Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy says:

"At first sight this form of taxation appears the more equitable one. In practice, however, customs duties ad valorem have been found to work out with great inequality and also to be inconvenient to levy, for various reasons, among which are the following: (1) The difficulty of ascertaining correctly the values of the goods charged with the duty; (2) the opening to fraud; (3) the delay and hindrances caused to importers and others. In theory it might be supposed that ad valorem taxes on all commodities would not affect their relative values, but it has been maintained that, owing to the different proportions in which fixed and circulating capitals enter into their cost of production, this would not be so. Thus J. S. Mill remarks (Principles of Pol. Econ., book 5, ch. 4, sec. 1) that in case of an ad valorem duty on all commodities exactly in proportion to their value there would be a disturbance of value owing to 'the different durability of the capital employed in different occupations.' * * * At the present date ad valorem duties as such are practically unknown to the British fiscal system; the wine duties levied differently on different classes of wine approach them."

British parliamentary investigations made in 1851 and 1852 resulted in committee reports favoring specific duties and showing the disadvantages of ad valorem duties.

Prof. E. J. James, writing on "Customs duties," in Lalor's Cyclopedia of Political Science, Political Economy, and the Political History of the United States, says:

"Duties ad valorem seem to be the best on account of their inherent fairness, and probably no other kind would ever have been imposed if it had not been for the many difficulties in the way of collecting ad valorem dues. The greatest obstacle in the way of collecting duties ad valorem is, naturally enough, the impossibility of arriving at a proper valuation of the goods to be taxed."

Prof. James also says:

"It can easily be seen how many opportunities there are for fraud; how easily, on the one hand, the Government may lose enormous sums by the carelessness or venality of its officers; how easily, on the other, commerce may be impeded or destroyed by the arbitrariness of the officials. The United States Government loses enormouns sums every year by undervaluation. In the case of silk goods it is estimated that the Government loses from 15 to 20 per cent on account of undervaluation, in spite of the most earnest efforts to prevent it. But worse than this loss is the delivering over of trade and commerce to the mercy of a set of officials. To leave an opportunity of arbitrary interference on the part of officials is to introduce into commerce an element which can never be estimated. Even the storms and winds of ocean may be subjected to an estimate of probabilities, but the whims of bureaucracy defy all attempts at computation. This uncertainty bears hardest on the small importer, for if he gets into trouble with the customs officials he has neither time nor money to carry on the contest. He must make a compromise immediately or be ruined. As a result the man of small capital must disappear from the ranks of importers, as he has, in fact, disappeared in America. There is another objection to the system of ad valorem duties. It prevents even the wholesale dealer from taking full advantage of the fluctuations of trade, for the duties must be paid according to the ruling market price; and even if a merchant has purchased a lot of goods at favorable prices, he must pay just as much duty as if he had paid the ordinary price, and he is thus deprived of a part of his gain. In this manner the very foundation of all healthful trade is constantly undermined. If we add to these points two other considerations we shall readily understand why ad valorem duties are gradually disappearing from the tariffs of civilized nations. The first of these is that we need officials of a much higher grade to administer a system of duties ad valorem than to administer a system of specific duties, and that they must consequently be paid higher wages. The second is that as the vigor of a system of ad valorem duties depends more completely on the administration, there is always danger that the customhouses of the various cities will vie with each other in leniency in order to attract trade from one port to another. Some charges of this sort have been made in our own country by the officials of one city against those of another. If we now turn our attention to specific duties, we find that they are free from many of the objections to duties ad valorem. They are easily administered, offer less chance for frauds, require less skill on the part of the officials, and are therefore cheaper and more lucrative."

In 1888 the Committee on Finance, in its report on the Mills bill, said, with reference to ad valorem and specific duties:

"The feature of the bill which most clearly indicates its purpose is the proposed substitution of ad valorem for specific duties. This substitution could have no other result than to change rates now protective for others which would not protect. The promoters of this bill must have been familiar with the testimony submitted to Congress by Secretary Manning, disclosing enormous frauds upon the revenue and honest merchants through the use of ad valorem rates. The frequency and notoriety of these frauds and the widespread demoralization resulting from them should have prevented any attempts to extend the system.

"The use of ad valorem rates has been condemned by the experience of every commercial nation in the world, by the judgment of those who have been intrusted with the responsibility of customs administration, and by honest importers and merchants, as well as by intelligent political economists and legislators of every shade of economic belief. The reasons for this general and sweeping condemnation are obvious; ad valorem rates are equally unsatisfactory and uncertain whether levied for revenue or for protective purposes; duties based on foreign-market value are, even under the most favorable circumstances, with honesty of purpose on the part of the importer and the highest degree of knowledge and unquestioned integrity on the part of the appraising officers, necessarily uncertain and unequal; but when, as now, many foreign importers deem the successful evasion of our revenue laws by unscrupulous methods the highest evidence of business capacity, ad valorem rates fail lamentably of their purpose. They greatly exaggerate variations in foreign prices. When business is depressed and foreign prices are abnormally low, when foreign competition is most to be dreaded, and when a defensive barrier is most needed by domestic producers, then ad valorem rates are lowest, protection is reduced, and depression is intensified. On the other hand, when foreign values are highest rates are highest and restriction enlarges into prohibition.

"If it is desirable that a sliding scale of duties should be adopted, rates should increase as foreign prices diminish. Ad valorem rates afford facilities for the grossest frauds upon the revenue; through undervaluations they invite evasions of the law and reward dishonest importers, while they destroy the business alike of honest importers and of domestic manufacturers. The foreign manufacturer practically fixes the duty which he is willing to pay, and in many cases the only limitation upon the amount of foreign importations is the extent to which the fear of detection influences the persons who make the invoices. The evils which flow from ad valorem rates are so great and so manifest that this plan of collecting duties has no advocates but professional and political revenue reformers and dishonest consignors.

"In illustration of the effect of the House bill to increase importations and break down domestic producers, we cite the application of ad valorem rates to the manufacture of fine cotton cloths. The specific rates now levied upon cotton cloths furnish no reasonable grounds for adverse criticism, either by the producers or consumers of cotton manufactures. The inevitable effect of the substitution would be to largely increase the importation of all the finer and more expensive classes of these goods, and to produce disorganization and depression in this important industry. The uniform rate of 40 per cent proposed bears very unevenly upon the various grades of goods. It would be, if collected upon an honest valuation, protective upon the coarser and commoner kinds, which are largely consumed by all classes of our people, but it would encourage the importation without restraint of those fine fabrics which may be properly designated as luxuries.

"The leading cotton manufacturers of the country joined in an emphatic protest to the framers of the bill against the adoption of ad valorem rates, and submitted the following strong statement of their objections to the system:

"'While the ad valorem method seems to theoretically have the merits of simplicity and equity, it is in practice found to be unreliable, a prolific source of undervaluation, false invoicing, and false oaths, and a premium upon commercial dishonesty, and to tend toward a transfer of legitimate business from honorable importers to the most irresponsible and unscrupulous class of foreign traders. A reference to the records of revenue from the customs department and the United States courts, or inquiry among importing houses, will convince you, it is believed, of the truth of the foregoing assertion, and that the gravity of the danger inherent from the ad valorem system is not exaggerated.

"'It is therefore thought to be proper to call your attention to this proposition of the adoption of ad valorem rates pure and simple, and to urge in the strongest manner that no such backward step be taken, however enticing it may appear theoretically, but that the ad valorem rates be used only where the specific form is inapplicable, or to supplement the latter in order to better equalize rates, as it is wisely applied in the present tariff.

"'While no classification of cotton cloths can be equitable, and discrepancies will from time to time appear and disappear, consequent on changes in processes and the fickleness of fashion, these inequalities are found in practice under the specific form to be so inconsiderable in amount as to have but an insignificant bearing upon the principle and a trifling effect upon the revenue or volume of business, and any objection based upon such inequalities would be found to be imaginary rather than real.'

"The proposal to apply this principle to all manufactures of wool would be equally unsatisfactory and destructive. The rate proposed in the woolen schedule would prevent importation of the low grades of flannels, blankets, and hats of wool, and all low and medium grades of cassimeres and other cloths which enter into the clothing of the great mass of our people, but would be insufficient upon all the finer classes of dress goods and cloths for men's wear. All the articles in both these schedules which could be classed as necessaries of life, and which are worn by our working men and women, would be protected by the rates proposed to the extent of exclusion of the foreign article, while upon all the finer and more expensive products, which are in the nature of luxuries and purchased largely by the rich, the rates would place no restraint upon importations and would furnish no protection to the American producer.

"Specific duties have been advocated by all our Secretaries of the Treasury, with one notable exception, Mr. Robert J. Walker, from Hamilton to the present incumbent of the office. The opinions of these officers are given in Appendix A. All the leading statesmen and financiers of Europe and all acknowledged authorities on taxation on either side of the Atlantic have advocated specific duties. They have been commended by all the principal administrative officers of customs, by the leading merchants, and by the chambers of commerce in all of our large cities for their simplicity and certainty in execution. No expert knowledge is required for their enforcement by customs officials, as the articles upon which they are levied have only to be counted, weighed, or measured. While specific duties are less liable to evasion and are certain and uniform in their operations, giving greater stability to the revenues, they also have the beneficial tendency to exclude from the country inferior, adulterated, and worthless goods.

APPENDIX A.

SPECIFIC DUTIES.

In 1795 Secretary Hamilton reports to the House of Representatives that, by existing laws, about one-third of the duties was derived from articles rated ad valorem, and adds:

"In other nations, where this branch of revenue, as with us, is of principal or very considerable consequence, and where no peculiarity of situation has tended to keep the duty low, experience has led to contract more and more the number of articles rated ad valorem, and, of course, to extend the number of those rated specifically—that is, according to weight, measure, or other rules of quantity. The reason of this is obvious; it is to guard against evasions, which infallibly happens in a greater or less degree when duties are high. * * * It is needless to repeat that this will contribute as much to the interest of the fair trader as to that of the revenue.

"It is believed that in our system the method of rating ad valorem could, with convenience, be brought within a much narrower compass, and it is evident that to do so will contribute materially to the security of the revenue." (American State Papers, Finance, vol. 1, p. 348.)

Secretary Gallatin, reporting to the Senate in 1801, said:

"In order to guard as far as possible against the value of goods being underrated in the invoices, it would be eligible to lay specific duties on all such articles now paying duties ad valorem as may be susceptible of that alteration." (American State Papers, Finance, vol. 1, p. 702.)

Secretary Dallas, reporting to the House of Representatives in 1816, says:

"Articles imported to a great amount should rather be charged with specific duties upon their weight and measure, in order to guard against evasions and frauds, than with ad valorem duties on their value.' (American State Papers, Finance, vol. 3, p. 91.)

Secretary Crawford, in 1817, in the report concerning revision of the revenue laws already referred to, calls attention to the subject of frauds, particularly in the importation of articles upon consignment paying ad valorem duties, and recommends a series of remedial provisions, which are mainly applicable to importations subjected to ad valorem duty, to which he adds:

"Whatever may be the reliance which ought to be placed in the efficacy of the foregoing provisions, it is certainly prudent to diminish as far as practicable the list of articles paying ad valorem duties," and submits a list of 124 enumerations to be transferred to the class of specifics. In 1819 he submitted a further list. (American State papers, Finance, vol. 3, pp. 236, 415.)

Secretary Meredith, in his report of December 3, 1849, says:

"I propose a return to the system of specific duties on articles on which they can be conveniently laid. The effects of the present ad valorem system are twofold, viz, on the revenue and on our own productions. Experience has, I think, demonstrated that, looking exclusively to the revenue, a specific duty is more easily assessed, more favorable to commerce, more equal, and less exposed to frauds than any other system. Of course such a duty is not laid without reference to the average cost of the commodity. This system obviates the difficulties and controversies which attend an appraisement of the foreign market value of each invoice, and it imposes an equal duty on equal quantities of the same commodity. Under the ad valorem system goods of the same kind and quality, and between which there can not be a difference in value in the same market at any given time, nevertheless may often pay different amounts of duty. Thus the hazards of trade are unnecessarily increased.

"To levy an ad valorem duty on foreign valuation equably at the different ports is believed to be impossible. That the standard of value at any two ports is precisely the same at any given time is wholly improbable. The facilities afforded to frauds upon the revenue are very great, and it is apprehended that such frauds have been and are habitually and extensively practiced. The statements annexed (marked O), to which I invite special attention, exhibit in a strong light the dangers to which this system is necessarily exposed.

"As the standard of value at every port must at last depend upon the average of the invoices that are passed there, every successful attempt at undervaluation renders more easy all that follow it. The consequences are, not only that the revenue suffers, that a certain sum is in effect annually given by the public among dishonest importers as a premium for their dishonesty, but that fair American importers may be gradually driven out of the business and their places supplied by unknown and unscrupulous foreign adventurers."

The adoption of specific duties has been uniformly favored by the executive officer of the Government and has been specially recommended by a number of the Secretaries of the Treasury in recent years.

Secretary Bristow, in his annual report for 1876, in commenting upon the administration of the customs revenues, said:

"Another remedy, and the most effective which could be adopted for correcting the evils of the appraisement system, is the substitution, so far as practicable, of specific for ad valorem duties. This change would work a great reduction in the amount of labor requiring the knowledge of experts. The entire process of ascertaining duties would be more simple, certain, and safe. Opportunities for collusive undervaluation would be greatly lessened, and if errors were committed they could not, as to specific rates and amounts, be accounted for except upon the supposition of culpable negligence or actual fraud, whereas, in respect to ad valorem duties, an error of judgment may readily be assigned as a sufficient explanation.

"Such change, either with or without a decrease in the number of dutiable articles, would insure a very considerable reduction of the force at the chief ports, with a consequent diminution of expenses."

Secretary Sherman, in his report to Congress for 1878, made the following suggestions with respect to specific duties:

"While not recommending a general revision of the tariff at the present time, it is deemed important that upon some articles the ad valorem duties now assessed should be converted into specific duties. As a rule, specific duties are to be preferred to either ad valorem or compound rates, and in any future revision of the tariff it is hoped that Congress will give preference to this system of imposing duties as far as practicable. The argument in favor of specific duties applies with great force to kid gloves, concerning the value of which, under the present ad valorem duties, serious differences of opinion have occurred between the importers and the Government during the past year, which have led to protracted delays in the ascertainment of the dutiable value, and consequent injury to the mercantile community."

In his report on the collection of duties for 1885 the late Secretary Manning said:

"In a system of ad valorem rates there are two critical points: One is dutiable value and the other is rate of duty. The present rate of duty on certain silk goods is 50 per cent of the market value at the time of exportation in the principal markets of the country, or what is equivalent to one-half of the importation. If the law were so administered by the Treasury Department that on the importation of one importer 50 per cent was levied, and on the importation of another importer 40 per cent, and on that of another importer 30 per cent, there would be a general outcry. So there would be if an importer at New York was required to pay only 30 per cent and if of another at Buffalo was demanded 40 per cent and of another at Chicago was required 50 per cent. But none the less illegal and intolerable result would follow if the dutiable value on one importation were fixed at $100, on another, by the same vessel, at $80, and on another, by the same vessel, at $60, the merchandise in all of the three being similar. If importers can illegally control dutiable values, they can control the amount of duties paid on the merchandise, although the ad valorem rate may be fixed and uniform for everybody and every port in the country.

* * * * * * *

"I do not make a recommendation to Congress for the restoration of the 'old moiety system' and the statutory inducement to informers, or the law concerning intent and burden of proof, which existed from 1799 to 1874. And I do not so recommend for the reason that the purpose of the House and Senate, in respect to the simplification of the rates of duty and a prudent enlargement of the application of specific rates, is necessarily unknown. Should some such last-named change be not made, I have little faith that the existing power of the Executive and of the courts will be adequate to secure honest invoices and full appraisement.

* * * * * * *

"The following extracts from the report of Mr. Forward, made nearly half a century ago, are instructive now, by way of showing his appreciation of the relation between ad valorem and specific rates, and the light in which foreign manufacturers sending their goods to this country on consignment were then regarded:

"'With a view to guard the revenue against fraudulent undervaluations which can not be entirely prevented by the existing scheme of ad valorem duties, specific duties are proposed in nearly all cases when practicable. The operation of the system of specific duties may not be perfectly equal in all cases in respect to the value of the articles included under it, but this inconvenience is more than compensated by the security of the revenue against evasions and by the tendency of specific duties to exclude worthless and inferior articles, by which purchasers and consumers are often imposed on.'

* * * * * * *

"One advantage, and perhaps the chief advantage, of a specific over an ad valorem system is in the fact that under the former duties are levied by a positive test, which can be applied by our officers while the merchandise is in the possession of the Government, and according to a standard which is altogether national and domestic. That would be partially true of an ad valorem system levied upon 'home value,' but there are constitutional impediments in the way of such a system which appear to be insuperable. But under an ad valorem system the facts to which the ad valorem rate is to be applied must be gathered in places many thousand miles away, and under circumstances most unfavorable to the administration of justice."

The present Secretary of the Treasury, in that portion of his last annual report relating to the administration of the customs laws, used the following language:

"Whatever the rates of customs taxation may be, the laws for the collection of the same should be made as efficient as possible. In this the bona fide importer, who wishes to gain only the legitimate profits of his business, the home manufacturer, and laborer are equally interested. They all have a right to demand that the laws be so administered as to give them every possible protection in their business. The high ad valorem tariff of the last quarter of a century has been the fruitful cause of devices to gain improper advantage at the customhouse. It is therefore desirable that in revising and reducing rates of duty they should be made specific instead of ad valorem, so far as the nature of the merchandise will admit. Theoretically considered, ad valorem are preferable to specific duties, but in practice, under such rates as we have had and must continue to have for years to come, the former are the too easy source of deception and inequality at the customhouse. Congress has it in its power to change from time to time, as may be advisable, specific rates, so as to meet any permanent changes in values."

In his report of December 4, 1911, Secretary MacVeagh likewise says:

AD VALOREM AND SPECIFIC DUTIES.

"The experience of the Treasury Department in administering the tariff laws brings to all who share this experience the most positive conviction that tariff legislation should adopt the policy of establishing specific duties instead of ad valorem duties wherever the nature of the article involved makes that a possibility. The practice of adopting ad valorem duties adds to the ease and quickness with which legislation may be prepared; but that is its only helpful quality—and that lonely quality has its palpable drawbacks. Ad valorem duties lead directly to the great majority of all the frauds upon the revenues with which the Treasury Department has to contend; and they do all they can to drive honest importers out of business. They add exceedingly to the expense and responsibility of administration and are responsible in largest measure for whatever demoralization exists in the importing appeal, but in practice they are a delusion and a snare."

The Tariff Board in its report on Schedule K discusses the objections to the present system of levying duties. On page 394, it says:

"The economic objection to an ad valorem duty on wool arises from the fact that the amount of duty paid, since it fluctuates with the foreign value of the commodity, would not be adjusted to the needs of the Government, of the consumer, nor of the American woolgrower. A speculative change in the market which increased the price of wool would automatically lead to an increase in the amount of duty at the very time that the manufacturer is most hampered by the existing high price, when the consumer most needs relief, and the woolgrower is most prosperous. On the other hand, a fall in price brings a reduction of duty at a time when the woolgrower is at greatest disadvantage and when manufacturers can best afford to pay the tax.

"The tendency of sheep breeding all over the world is toward crossbreds, and the advocates of ad valorem wool duties have complained that under the present system of specific duties crossbreds can be imported more favorably than merinos, and that when the market for crossbreds declines the advantage in favor of the crossbreds is still further increased. During the season 1906–7, which was a normal one, the specific duty on South American crossbreds, taking into account the prices then prevailing in the foreign markets, was equivalent to an ad valorem rate of about 43–45 per cent. In the following season, 1907–8, including the time of the financial panic prices abroad declined steadily, so that in May, 1908, the specific duty on the same grade of crossbred wool was equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 75 per cent. By thus increasing the ad valorem equivalent when foreign prices are low and decreasing it when foreign prices are high the specific duty automatically protects American woolgrowers against declines in the wool markets abroad and at the same time favors the American buyer when the foreign wools increase in value. In the case of drought or other calamity in the American woolgrowing industry and overproduction abroad, or vice versa, the specific duties would have a corrective tendency. Ad valorem duties would act in an entirely contrary manner—decreasing with the decline of values abroad and increasing with the rise of foreign markets, thus tending to throw open the American market to foreign wools in times of depression, when they could least withstand such pressure, and, on the other hand, when there was a scarcity of wool at home and prices soared, it would be impossible to find relief abroad.

"America occupies a unique position among the nations with regard to her woolgrowing and wool manufacturing, having practically no outlet for either in foreign markets. The American woolgrower is entirely dependent upon the home market. If the basic idea of the duty on wools is to give the domestic grower permanent protection, it should remain as uniformly effective as possible under all changes of foreign conditions (shortage, overproduction, etc.). Ad valorem duties would not accomplish this, being ineffective in times of overproduction and low prices abroad, and giving an unnecessarily high protection in times of scarcity and high prices in foreign countries."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the rates proposed by the conference committee are not what I wish they were—that is, I would prefer a specific duty rather than an ad valorem duty; but when we take the Payne-Aldrich bill and consider the provision for skirted wool, I believe that even this rate is as high, or nearly as high, as it is under the Payne-Aldrich bill so far as it applies to raw wool. For that reason I shall vote for the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the conference report. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not seeing him present, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER], and I ask that this announcement may stand for the day. I will state further that he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. CUMMINS (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KENYON] is detained from the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] stands paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. We have arranged for a transfer so that we may both vote. I therefore transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. STEPHENSON's name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is out of the city. He has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from Wisconsin were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. By arrangement I transfer my pair to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] so that he will stand paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], but transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], but by mutual arrangement that pair has been transferred to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

I also desire to say that my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). Under the arrangement announced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

Mr. BAILEY. I have now, and have had for quite a time, a pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], and I therefore refrain from voting on this question. In order to save myself and the Senate the trouble of repeating this announcement from time to time, I desire it to answer for all votes until the Senator from Montana returns.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I desire to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair existing between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Bacon	Gronna	Overman	Stone
Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Swanson
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Reed	Thornton
Bryan	Kern	Shively	Tillman
Chamberlain	La Follette	Simmons	Watson
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Works
Culberson	Myers	Smith, Md.

NAYS—28.

Borah	Crane	McCumber	Root
Bourne	Cullom	McLean	Sanders
Bradley	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Burnham	Fall	Nelson	Smoot
Burton	Gallinger	Page	Sutherland
Catron	Jones	Penrose	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Perkins	Wetmore

NOT VOTING—31.

Bailey	Davis	Heyburn	Paynter
Brandegee	Dixon	Hitchcock	Percy
Briggs	du Pont	Kenyon	Poindexter
Brown	Foster	Lea	Rayner
Chilton	Gamble	Lippitt	Richardson
Clarke, Ark.	Gardner	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Cummins	Gore	Oliver	Warren
Curtis	Guggenheim	Owen

So the conference report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill stands passed.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senate to take up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 24023).

Mr. McCUMBER. Will not the Senator from Wyoming yield to me to have disposed of the conference report on the pension appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. I have nothing to yield, because I have not yet got up the report, but I will do so if the report is taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks that the Senate now take up for consideration the conference report on what is known as the legislative bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. WARREN. For what purpose? I ask the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is for the purpose of disposing of the conference report on the pension appropriation bill as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. WARREN. As the pensioners of this country are to-day without their last quarter's pensions, and there is no money with which to pay them the amounts that were due on the 4th day of this month, I feel I am justified, although I am anxious that the conference report on the legislative bill shall be disposed of, in yielding to the Senator from North Dakota time to present his conference report; and I hope it may proceed as rapidly as the pleasure of the Senate will permit, as it is a very important matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am obliged to the Senator from Wyoming.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present the report I send to the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senate having taken up the other report by unanimous consent, can it be displaced in this way?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand it is displaced, but the Senate can permit it to be temporarily interrupted for the purpose of considering another matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But that would also require unanimous consent, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it would not. It can be done by a majority vote or when no objection is interposed.

Mr. LODGE. But a conference report is privileged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is not required to receive a conference report.

Mr. WARREN. The first presentation of a conference report is, under our rules, privileged, and it can be made at any time except during the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is correct.

Mr. WARREN. Its consideration afterwards is another matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming is entirely correct. The only suggestion presented to the Chair was whether the unanimous consent to take up the report for consideration could be displaced, even for an interruption, except by unanimous consent. But the Chair will hold——

Mr. OVERMAN. Are not unanimous consents always made subject to the rules of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand a unanimous consent to take up a bill to stand in the same category as a unanimous consent fixing the procedure of the Senate, and that it will after thus taking up a bill continue its consideration until finally disposed of. It is only an acquiescence or consent on the part of the Senate in taking up a bill. But the Chair does not hold that that would prevent the Senate from laying it aside at any time it wishes to do so. It is not in the nature of a unanimous consent which would bind the Senate to consider it until a final vote upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we can dispose of this report within a very few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is consent to proceed to its consideration, but it is not in the nature of a unanimous consent that binds the Senate to continue its consideration until the matter is disposed of. There is no such provision in the agreement which the Senate made. It was simply to proceed to its consideration. It was not an agreement that it might proceed longer than might suit the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The matter which was before the Senate was the report of a conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was certainly as privileged as any other report of a conference committee, and having been taken up by unanimous consent for action——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Surely the chairman in charge of the first conference report would not have authority to consent to displace it and take up another conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming could not do anything more than consent to an interruption, and it would then at last depend upon the action of the Senate if there were objection made.

Mr. LODGE. When the unfinished business has once been laid aside temporarily by unanimous consent, any business can be taken up without displacing it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They are not talking about the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. I know. But as to a conference report, of course, it is privileged. That conference report was under debate. This conference report has never been presented to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that the right to present a conference report is a privileged right under the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then whether the Senate will proceed to its consideration is a matter always within the control of a majority of the Senate. As to the conflict with the prior consent, the Chair will repeat that the prior consent was simply to take up the matter. It was not a consent which could not be displaced at any time by a majority vote of the Senate. If it had been that the Senate should take up the measure and proceed with its consideration to a final conclusion, then it could not have been displaced; but there was no such agreement on the part of the Senate. It was simply an agreement to proceed to the consideration of it, which the Senate could withdraw at any time it saw fit to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not mean to suggest a view in any respect different from the ruling of the Chair. I understood that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that if the question of the consideration of the report presented by the Senator from North Dakota is raised, then that is a matter to be determined by a majority vote of the Senate. If not raised, the Chair will consider it as acquiesced in by the Senate and will proceed to put the question on its adoption.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In the matter inserted by the Senate strike out the words "$500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 7, 8, and 12, and agree to the same.

The conferees further report that they are unable to agree as to amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and 11.

P. J. McCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there has been so much discussion of this matter within the last two or three days by the press of the country and the other House that it seems incumbent upon me to make some explanations concerning the delay of the conferees in reaching an agreement up to the present time; and so also some of the charges that have been made with respect to the action of the Senate conferees seem to me also to demand an answer upon my part.

For the past two days there have appeared divers articles in the press purporting to quote from addresses made in the other House in reference to the matter of the disagreement between the two Houses upon the pension appropriation bill. I have not had an opportunity to examine the RECORD, but as portions of these addresses were under quotation, I assume that they were as published.

Taking these addresses as a whole, the comedy of A Midsummer Night's Dream is the soul of seriousness compared with the theatrical display apparent in the charges of discourtesy and contempt made against the Senate conferees, or any member thereof, for refusing to surrender their strong and tenable position that whenever in an appropriation bill any general legislation is sought to be enacted, and the two Houses are unable to agree with respect thereto, such proposed legislation should be eliminated from the appropriation bill and placed on its merits before the Houses in a separate bill. In other words, that a bill whose proper scope is limited to appropriations ought not to be seriously delayed by an attempt to force through as a rider that which the two Houses can not agree upon.

Mr. President, they pay scant compliment to the average intelligence of the great army of Civil War veterans who suppose that the even tenor of their way, political or otherwise, will be changed by blatant buncombe or pseudo sympathy.

These veterans have long since passed the days of childhood, and are still very far from the second childhood of age. Therefore any argument in Congress or out of Congress which deals with them with such shams and pretenses as would scarcely appeal to a child over 10 years of age is an insult to their intelligence.

They are just as capable to-day of discerning friend from foe in the political field as they were on the physical field of battle; and I am certain that the only influence that will be created by any attempt to make political capital out of the inability of the conferees to reach an agreement on the question of the abolition of pension agencies will be a sentiment of disgust at so cheap and puerile an attempt.

Therefore that part of the arguments published in the press and purporting to come from the Representative of a great State which seeks to capitalize soldier sentiment by such arguments as I have mentioned seems to me to be not worthy of any reply, and I shall not dignify it by an attempt to answer it.

There are, however, charges against the conferees of the Senate of disrespectful treatment which should not go unanswered. It is somewhat strange that this disrespectful treatment only impressed one who is not a member of that conference. In justice to the conferees on both sides it is proper for me to say that such a statement is worse than untrue. The relations between the members of the conference committee on both sides have been most cordial and friendly. If failure to surrender a point constitutes contemptuous treatment, then of course each side has treated the other in a contemptuous manner, and that is true of every conference on every appropriation bill, as all have been delayed for the same cause.

Much has been said concerning the cause of delay in the matter of this pension appropriation bill. There has been just one cause of delay, and that is that the Senate conferees and the House conferees have so far not been able to reach an agreement. There are, of course, a number of incidents which have prevented meetings at times, such as the engagement of Senators and Members and other causes of delay in either one House or the other, but they are incidental only.

There has been sufficient time to consider the differences, and they have been considered many times when the conferees were in session together and many times when the conferees of each one of the Houses were separately considering the matter. The one great important cause has been the inability of the conferees to agree. Practically every other appropriation bill is in exactly the same position. The conferees were unable to agree, and resolutions had to be passed making appropriations for the fiscal year until such an agreement could be reached.

The House proposes to change existing law. The Senate proposes to continue the existing law. Each body has a right to its own convictions. The members of the conference on each side are supposed to support the sentiment of their respective Houses on the matter, or, failing in their efforts, then to secure an agreement that will conform as nearly as possible to the expressed desire of the Senate.

The position of the two Houses to-day on the pension appropriation is about this: The House has voted to abolish 17 out of the 18 agencies. The Senate has voted to retain those agencies. The House bases its action upon the ground that a saving can be had to the Government by abolishing these agencies. The Senate bases its stand upon the assumption that no saving would follow, but in the long run that the abolition of all of the agencies would tend to increase the cost of pension administration. The two Houses differ upon this question.

I insist, with this radical difference between the two Houses, if the difference can not be reconciled by the conferees then the House should recede and should not hamper the passage of necessary appropriations, but should take up the matter of changing this law by a bill for that purpose, pass it through the House, and submit on its merits to the Senate.

I have before suggested that if it comes before the Committee on Pensions there will be no question but that we can call a meeting at any time and report it out of the committee and into the Senate, so that it can be acted upon either affirmatively or negatively, and that is the proper way to dispose of it in case the two Houses are unable to come to an agreement.

There need be no delay, and if an appropriation is made covering these agencies and afterwards the agencies should be abolished then the appropriation will not be spent. We should not jeopardize the speedy passage of the appropriations, on which we are all agreed, by insisting upon something upon which we do not agree and as to which up to the present time there has been an irreconcilable difference between the conferees on each side.

Now, Mr. President, this brings me directly to the point whether or not it is proper that we should change these agencies. That matter has been discussed upon this floor, and votes have been had upon it in past Congresses. Let us remember that the work which is now done by these agencies and their clerks must be done by some one; the work has to be done; it can not be left out of consideration in abolishing the agencies. The clerical service and other service that would be required under the agency system will be required here in the city of Washington if a change should be made. The grade of clerks who will be compelled to perform the services here and the grade of those who will oversee the work, the heads of the bureaus or bureau which has it under consideration, will be such that I assume it will cost very nearly as much here as it does at the several agencies. For instance, these agency heads are paid $4,000 annually. We will, of course, cease paying the agents $4,000 each if we abolish the agencies, but some one will have to be paid here for overseeing that character of work. Probably it will be assigned to clerks or officials who are receiving, say, a salary of from $2,000 to $2,500 annually. Then, Mr. President, there would be a saving of from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars upon that item.

Now, that, in my opinion, would be the only saving, and the saving of some $4,000, I think, in rent; but I am not certain there would be a saving there, because I am inclined to think you would have to rent other buildings here for the extra clerks who would be required.

Now here arises, then, the difference in clerk hire, and my candid belief is that it will cost more than the saving of from twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars. Let us remember that in Washington the average clerk receives from twelve to fourteen hundred dollars per annum, or over $100 per month, with a month on sick leave and a month of vacation. I believe that the average paid to the clerks in these several agencies runs from $50 to $75 per month. Then let us remember that here the clerks cease to work always at half-past 4, and, whether it is the climatic conditions or otherwise, it is well known by everyone that a given number of clerks in a department in the city of Washington never accomplish as much as would the same number of clerks anywhere else in the United States.

I received word from a very important land office in Montana the other day in which it was stated to me, and stated as a positive fact, that 7 clerks were there doing the work that would ordinarily be done by from 15 to 20 clerks in the city of Washington; that they were working until 7 o'clock every evening—sometimes later—and were also working part of Sunday, in order to keep up the work. Now, I place that as against the efficiency of the clerks in the departments in the city of Washington. Thus remembering, Mr. President, that the clerical work will have to be done by clerks somewhere, I believe that the extra cost of doing the work in the city of Washington, upon our strict limitation of hours, will cost us in the long run much more than we could possibly save by abolishing these agencies.

Mr. President, this matter was discussed by the Senate last year. It was most thoroughly discussed, I think, two years ago by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and by other Senators, and the facts and figures they produced were such as to convince me, and, I believe, to convince the majority of the Members of the Senate, that there would be no economy in the abolition of these agencies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if he can give a list of the States in which these agencies exist?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not a list here, but I could undoubtedly get it. I would have to send for the report of the Commissioner of Pensions in order to give it. I will state that the principal places in the West are San Francisco, Milwaukee, Chicago, and Topeka (Kans.). Then there is one in New Hampshire, one in New York, one in Pennsylvania, one in Tennessee, one in Kentucky, one in Georgia, and in a number of other places.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the information I desired.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is one in Columbus, Ohio, and one in Detroit, Mich.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I inquire how many there are in all?

Mr. McCUMBER. There are 18 in all, including the 1 in the city of Washington. The bill as it passed the House would abolish only the 17 outside of this city. I can see no reason for abolishing those outside of the city any more than abolishing the 1 in this city. If they are to be abolished all should be abolished and their duties performed by officials and clerks in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I inquire what is the total expense of these agencies?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think some seventy-odd thousand dollars—in the neighborhood of that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The impression prevails on the part of those around me that the expense is between two and three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. That can not be established by any kind of reasoning, nor have I ever heard it claimed that it was any such sum. I have heard it stated that there might be a saving of $250,000, but there could not be such a saving. Though the pension agencies were abolished, all the work now performed by the pension agents would have to be performed by others, and such others would have to be paid.

I wish to speak of another thing, and that is the convenience of the soldiers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are 18 agencies. The head officer of each gets $4,000, does he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is an average of half a dozen clerks at each, running up as high as $1,500 apiece for some of them.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think any receive as high a sum as that, but the clerks are very low priced compared with what is paid here. The Senator must remember that if the clerks do not do the work at these agencies other clerks must do the work somewhere else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator one more question. How many of these agencies were established by the President and not by act of Cngress?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that some three or four were established by act of Congress and the others were established under a law authorizing the President to establish them. I will come to that a little further on.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. The amendments upon which the conferees of the two Houses could not agree are amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. McCUMBER. They all relate to this subject of agencies.

Mr. OVERMAN. The salaries of these agents in amendment numbered 2 amount to $72,000. For clerk hire and other services——

Mr. McCUMBER. I said seventy-odd thousand dollars. I did not have the exact amount before me.

Mr. OVERMAN. The expense at the existing pension agencies, amendment third, is $385,000, and amendment 5, for examination and inspection of pension agencies, is $4,000 more, which would make in the neighborhood of $450,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the total rental paid at the 17 agencies?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is only one place for which that appropriation is made.

Mr. OVERMAN. In New York for rent $4,000 is paid. Then the inspection is $4,000 more, making $8,000, which, added to $385,000, is $393,000, and with the $72,000 it makes nearly $500,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not for rent?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; for the whole expenditure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked what was the amount paid for rent.

Mr. OVERMAN. For rent of the pension agency at New York, $4,250. That is the only place where rent is included.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I suppose the House would hope to save would be the higher salaries that are paid to the agents. I do not understand that there is any claim that the clerk hire could be materially lessened. I am convinced that the clerk hire here will be considerably more if we abolish the agencies, and the expense will be considerably greater under a system of bringing all here to the city of Washington than under the present system.

I do not desire, Mr. President, to go into a lengthy argument upon that point, because it was argued so fully by Senators some two years ago, but I want to consider for a moment the convenience also of the soldiers. In the large cities there are a great number of old soldiers. Most of those can go directly to the agency and execute their vouchers and obtain their checks the same day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Those who are not so favorably situated, but who are at a convenient distance, can receive their vouchers and their checks very much sooner than they could if mailed from Washington. For instance, if the agent is located at San Francisco and the payment is to be made on the 4th of August from that city and the vouchers are there ready to be signed, the pensioner in that city can sign his voucher at that time and receive his pension the same day, while, if it were mailed from the city of Washington at the same time, on the 4th, he would receive it some considerable time thereafter. In the end I do not think it would make a great deal of difference to those who receive by mail, because the difference between the receipt on one month and on the other after the first adjustment would probably be the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has about answered what I was going to ask him. He answered it in his last remark. Under our present system, I understand, all the vouchers are made out here, payable to the pensioner, and instead of being sent direct to the pensioner by mail they are sent to that agent, and that agent remails them.

As I gathered from the information this morning as we had it, the checks get there in the office and stay there in the office while if sent direct to the pensioner from here he would get them just as quickly as they would reach the pension agency. These same vouchers go to the pension agent, and all that he and his clerks have to do is to send them out. Suppose the voucher were sent from Washington to the pensioner in Illinois or South Dakota. It goes directly to him as fast as the mail can carry it. Under the present system it goes to the agency—I suppose in Milwaukee, if that is the nearest agency, and from Milwaukee it is remailed to a pensioner in South Dakota. Therefore it would be bound to get to the pensioner two or three days earlier if sent direct from Washington than if sent under the present system.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is not wholly conversant with the system of making these disbursements. If I understand the method correctly, long before the 4th of each month in which a payment is to be made, the vouchers and everything else necessary are in the hands of the pension agent, and the pension agent mails them on the 4th of the month.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does he send the voucher first or send the voucher afterwards?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the present system the voucher is first sent.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is sent from here?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the voucher is not sent from here to the pension agency on the 4th day of the month, but the pension agency has the voucher before the 4th day of the month and sends it out on the 4th.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that, but——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. The Senator must easily see that the pension agency issuing the voucher in San Francisco on the 4th day of August will get that voucher in the hands of the claimant sooner than if it were sent on the 4th day of the month from the city of Washington.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now——

Mr. McCUMBER. But, as I said, I do not consider that of vital importance. It might be at first, but after that time the length of time between payments would be practically the same. But I do say there is a convenience to those in the same place, in the large cities, who can go personally to the pension agencies and make out the vouchers and sign them and swear to them there, and in the matter of having corrections made or anything else that may be necessary. The pensioner would lose considerable time by a system that would require it to be sent through the mails, for if there was any error to be corrected it would have to be sent back to him and corrected and resworn to and be sent through the mails again.

I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. As I understand it, everything is done from Washington. The check is made out and signed here and the voucher, I understand, is made out here, and everything is sent to the pension agency, and all the pensioner does, as I understand it, is to go to the agency and sign the voucher.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are not made out in Washington at all. All the vouchers are in the hands of the agent and the checks are in the hands of the agent. The agency sends out the vouchers. It issues them and sends them out, as I understand, on the 4th day of the month for which the payment is to be made. Then upon the return of the voucher the check is sent out, and it is sent by mail. If the soldier can repair to the agency himself, as he can in a great many cases in a city like Chicago, which has a population considerably more than many of the States and necessarily has a large soldier population, he can get his voucher and his check on the same day and settle the whole matter in a single transaction.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason, which I have urged before, why I believe the system of dealing with the matter through the agencies is far better than to concentrate everything here in the city of Washington. I have claimed before, and I still claim, that it is better for the Government itself if the functions of Government—if the hand of governmental power—can be exercised at different places all over the United States.

It is better as a matter of information, as a matter of bringing the population in close contact with governmental matters, as a matter of creating a patriotic feeling, as a matter of making people feel and know that they are a part of the Government itself. I say, even taking that alone into consideration, even though it may cost a little more, it is really better for the people of the United States that some of the great functions of government should be exercised outside the city of Washington. There are a great many people in the United States who only know of their relation to the General Government and its powers by what they hear of the amount of taxes they pay—nearly a billion dollars a year to support the Government. As to how it is done, under what system, they know but very little, except as to the Post Office Department.

I believe, therefore, first, that the work can be done much more cheaply in the country, that more can be accomplished at the agencies, that the same number of persons will accomplish far more in the matter of work, and will save to the Government a far greater amount than could possibly be saved by abolishing these agencies and performing all the clerical service connected with those agencies in the city of Washington.

I therefore move, Mr. President, that the Senate further insist upon its amendments not agreed to by the conferees, and that the conferees at the further conference be appointed on the part of the Senate by the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. As a substitute for that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the question now pending is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the first question to be disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe that would come first, and I therefore withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to make a motion which I think is in order. It is that the Senate recede from amendments No. 2——

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that the question is first on agreeing to the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion the Senator from North Carolina proposes to make is not now in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Agreeing to the conference report disposes of the amendments which have been agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate may recede from its amendments and agree to the bill as it was passed by the House. This matter seems to have been given much consideration in the House. When it came to the Senate it was referred to the committee, reported back, was passed here by a unanimous-consent agreement when but few Senators were present, and it has been in conference for some time.

On the first of this month, during a discussion of this matter, the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], in answer to a suggestion which I made that the Secretary of the Interior had recommended that these agencies be abolished, stated that he had no knowledge of any recommendation of that character, either by the Secretary of the Interior or by any Commissioner of Pensions. If the Senator had known that, I am sure that this morning he would not have argued that it would cost just as much or perhaps more to consolidate these 17 agencies as to maintain them as they now are. The Secretary of the Interior did make a recommendation that these agencies outside of the District of Columbia be abolished, and he made it upon the report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. President, it has been recommended to Congress several times by the Interior Department. The last time was in the report of the Secretary of the Interior dated December 10, 1910, as follows:

> From time to time Congress has been asked to abolish or decrease the number of pension agencies in the United States, with a view to economy in the disbursements of pensions.
> I recommend that this matter be given careful consideration by Congress, as it appears from the annexed report that in the neighborhood of $200,000 can be saved in the cost of the payment of pensions by the abolishment of all of the agencies.

Then he appends a letter to him from Mr. J. L. Davenport, Commissioner of Pensions, and I ask permission to have inserted, without reading, as a part of my remarks this letter from the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before that is done I will ask the Senator if he finds anything in Mr. Davenport's letter that justifies the conclusion that Mr. Davenport has affirmatively advised that these agencies shall be abolished?

Mr. BRYAN. I think he demonstrates here——

Mr. GALLINGER. A day or two ago I had occasion to examine what I think was the last hearing at which Mr. Davenport appeared, and while he did not oppose it, because he is not a man who opposes what Congress wishes to do, this was the concluding sentence in that hearing on the part of Mr. Davenport:

> It is such a radical change in the way of payment that we would have to try it first in Washington and see if it was feasible to work out.

Mr. BRYAN. What is the date of that?

Mr. GALLINGER. That, I think, was a couple of years ago. I have not the hearing before me now, but I had it before me two or three days ago, and I noticed that that was the concluding sentence of Mr. Davenport's statement made to that committee.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator will find that in his letter he shows there would be a saving of $80,000 if nine were abolished. Then he also makes the statement—

> Should the law be so changed as to abolish the pension-agency service and provide for the payment of pensions through a disbursing officer, under the Commissioner of Pensions, the cost of paying pensions would be as follows:
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Clerk hire | $300,000 |
> | Stationery and other necessary expenses | 20,000 |

Then he says:

> There would be still a further reduction in the cost of printing pension vouchers, etc., which would make a reduction of over * * * $200,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. In what document does the Senator find that—in the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. BRYAN. It is in a House document. I will send it to the Senator's desk.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to look at it for a moment.

Mr. BRYAN. Have I permission, Mr. President, to print the letter to which I have referred in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted to insert the matter referred to by the Senator from Florida.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OCTOBER 4, 1910.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith estimates for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, as follows:

Army and Navy pensions	$153,000,000
Fees and expenses of examining surgeons	200,000
Salaries of 18 pension agents, at $4,000 each	72,000
Clerk hire and other services, pension agencies	385,000
Rent, New York City agency	4,500
Examination and inspection of pension agencies	1,500
Stationery and other necessary expenses of pension agencies	25,000

This estimate is based upon the law as it now stands, providing for 18 pension agencies. If, however, the number of agencies be reduced from 18 to 9, the expense of conducting the agencies would be as follows:

Salaries of 9 pension agents, at $4,000 each	$36,000
Clerk hire	345,000
Stationery and other necessary expenses	25,000
Examination and inspection of pension agencies	1,000

This would make a reduction in the expense of conducting the agencies of $80,000 per annum. Should the law be so changed as to abolish the pension-agency service and provide for the payment of pensions through a disbursing officer, under the Commissioner of Pensions, the cost of paying pensions would be as follows:

Clerk hire	$300,000
Stationery and other necessary expenses	20,000

This would make a reduction in the cost of paying pensions in this one bill of $168,000, as compared with the estimates for the 18 agencies. There would be a still further reduction in the cost of printing pension vouchers, printing pension checks, and in the keeping of records in this bureau which are now necessary under the present system, which would make a reduction (including the $168,000 above mentioned) of over $200,000 in the cost of the payment of pensions.

Very respectfully,

J. L. DAVENPORT, Commissioner.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota was mistaken when he said the Commissioner of Pensions had never recommended that these agencies be abolished. He was mistaken when he said that the Secretary of the Interior had never recommended that they should be abolished. The Secretary of the Interior says from time to time the abolishment of these useless agencies has been recommended to Congress after Congress.

The Senator from North Dakota is also mistaken that there would be no saving, if the figures of the Commissioner of Pensions are to be relied upon. After that statement was made I was so sure that the recommendations had often been made that these useless agencies be abolished, and I was so surprised to hear the chairman of the committee say that he had never heard of such a proposition that I went to the library and got the volumes and placed them under my desk waiting for this matter to come up.

In 1907, in an appropriation act for the payment of invalid and other pensions, a proviso was adopted instructing the Secretary of the Interior to make inquiry and report to Congress whether these agencies ought to be retained or abolished, and in December, 1907, Secretary Garfield recommended that they should be abolished. He takes up the objections to which the Senator from North Dakota refers, the matter of delay in the receipt of the pension vouchers, and says that while there might be some delay of two or three days, yet checks are mailed so as to reach their destinations at a certain time and that could very easily be avoided. If the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior be followed, that the old out-of-date system of using vouchers be abolished and a system of checks be substituted therefor, there then can be no merit in that contention.

But again he says:

All vouchers now required by pensioners are printed by the Government Printing Office in this city and forwarded to the different pension agents, there to be prepared and mailed to the pensioner with checks for the preceding quarter. All checks now used by the pension agents are likewise printed in this city. A considerable saving would result in the cost of printing vouchers and also in the cost of printing checks if such vouchers and checks were prepared for 1 agency rather than for 18.

But, Mr. President, what seems to be the objection considered to be of most weight by the Senator from North Dakota is that as a matter of patriotism it is better to have these 17 agencies so that the people can swarm around and look at a pension agency and imbibe some knowledge of the affairs of their Government.

The suggestion is also made by the Senator that we would have to rent space here in Washington, but the Secretary of the Interior says there is already space enough and to spare in the building provided for the Bureau of Pensions.

Then, finally, it is submitted that clerks work shorter hours here and are paid more than they are elsewhere. If that be true, Mr. President, the way to remedy that evil is to make them work longer hours and pay them less.

There is nothing so expensive about living in Washington as compared with any other city. It is not the only attractive city where people like to live. The purpose of having agencies established so that 17 men can draw high salaries and have under them clerks costing the Government necessarily between $100,000 and $200,000 does not seem to me, Mr. President, to justify the Senate in rejecting the bill as it comes from the House and insisting upon the Senate amendments, because it is not a question of politics in the House. The leader of the minority there also said that he hopes the conferees on the part of the House will stand firm and never give in on this proposition.

Mr. President, when this thing is boiled down to its final meaning it is that there is some pleasure or some benefit supposed to be derived by the States or the congressional districts or the cities or the towns in which these agencies are located. I rather sympathize with the view submitted by the House that the House has the right to make appropriation for the maintenance of whatever branch they see fit to keep and to provide for.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if there is any difference or any cost to the soldiers?

Mr. BRYAN. There is not a bit of difference to the soldiers. The only difference is it would save about $200,000 and abolish some offices that are useless.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought perhaps there might be a commission charged.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to call attention briefly to this matter of costs. I have here tables showing the cost per pensioner at each of the agencies, and the average cost per pensioner for all agencies is 56½ cents. The average cost of Washington is 63.8 cents—that is, Washington is 7 cents per pensioner higher in expense. If you will carefully examine the total, it will be seen that of course the expenses per pensioner decline with the number of pensioners; but if you will take New York, it is about the same as Washington, but if you take Philadelphia, which has 52,660 pensioners, only 2,000 more than Washington, it is only 50 cents a pensioner, as against 63.8 cents in Washington, according to this table which I ask to have printed. Chicago is a large agency. The cost there is only 46 cents per pensioner; at Knoxville, with 59,253 pensioners, the cost is only 50.3 cents per pensioner; at Boston, with 54,538 pensioners, the cost is 48.8 per pensioner; but, as I have said, the average is 56½ cents, while for Washington it is 63.8 cents, with 50,663 pensioners—a large number. I shall ask leave to have this table printed in the RECORD.

I want to say, in regard to the local pension agencies, that they are of very great value to the old soldiers in their respective neighborhoods. They are saved a great deal of trouble. If they wish to make out an application for an increase of pension, or anything of that kind, the agent is there; he is able to help them, to save them from counsel fees, to furnish them with papers, and also to give information which can only be obtained through a local man. I do not believe there would be the slightest saving in money if the local agencies were abolished, and I believe that it would add very much to the inconvenience of the old soldiers, who are universally in favor of the maintenance of these local offices.

The fact that the other House stand firm does not seem to be an argument why the Senate should not also stand firm if they think they are in the right. If there is no objection, I ask that the table be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Cost per pensioner at the various agencies.

	Number of pensioners.	Cost per pensioner.
		Cents.
Augusta	15,257	77.6
Boston	54,538	48.8
Buffalo	38,292	61
Chicago	69,955	46.4
Columbus	87,603	46.1
Concord	14,213	82.1
Des Moines	49,597	51.7
Detroit	36,917	59.9
Indianapolis	55,841	43.6
Knoxville	59,253	50.3
Louisville	24,254	66.6
Milwaukee	45,721	50.2
New York	50,378	63.6
Philadelphia	52,660	50.6
Pittsburgh	40,362	59.5
San Francisco	43,766	54.7
Topeka	102,828	40.8
Washington	50,663	63.8

Average cost per pensioner for all agencies is 56½ cents.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior says that it has often been recommended to Congress to dispense with these useless pension agencies. Not only is that true of the pension agencies, but it is true as to ports of entry and as to various other things. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended again and again that useless ports of entry, where the expenses are more than the receipts, be done away with. When the recommendation gets to the two Houses it is found that there are a lot of political interests at stake, and as a consequence they are not done away with.

I find that one of these pension agencies is in Massachusetts. I find that one of them is in New Hampshire; that one of them is in New York; one of them is in Chicago, Ill.; one is in Ohio; one is in Iowa; one is in Michigan; one is in Indiana; one is in Kentucky; one is in Wisconsin; two are in Pennsylvania; one is in California; one is in Topeka; and one is in Washington. They are scattered, if I have counted aright, through 15 different States. Of course each State has two Senators, and if each Senator from each State where there is a pension agency is going to vote against its abolition it will require a very strong public sentiment and very strong departmental recommendations to secure the abolition of such agencies. I take it for granted that both Senators from each State in which there is a pension agency will not fight the continuance of the pension agency.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says he can not see how the abolition would bring any saving of money. I do not know what the rent is. I have not the figures by me, but incidentally in the debate it seems that the rent in New York is $4,000 per annum. I presume that it is about $1,200 per annum in the other places, on the average.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the other places the agencies are in the public buildings, and no rent whatever is paid.

Mr. McCUMBER. No rent is paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. New York is the only place where any rental is paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In all the other places——

Mr. GALLINGER. In all the other places they are in public buildings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Then it would seem that the saving in rent would not be so very immense, but that is something. It is admitted all around that there would be a saving by the abolition of the offices of the chiefs of these various pension agencies. They will not be needed here if the force shall be moved here. I do not think all the clerks will be needed here, because a great deal of the work can be done by clerks who are already employed; and as the clerks now employed in the agencies, who would be removed here at first, die or otherwise become separated from the public service it will not be necessary to fill all of their places.

I think it is a sad commentary, Mr. President, upon our way of doing things, which is evident not only with regard to these pension agencies, but evident, too, with regard to ports of entry, National Guard encampments, and heaven knows what else, that whenever an expense is fixed upon the Federal Government it is almost impossible to get rid of it. There is always standing in the way some patronage interest that will be damaged, and somebody representing in the best of way, generally more out of good nature than anything else, the patronage interest at stake; and then, whenever you have even a military post anywhere in the country, if the War Department wants to get rid of it as being useless for military purposes, harmful in fact, as necessitating a too great division of the Army forces of the country, there immediately arises some Representative or some Senator, who imagines that trade is encouraged or something else good is done for a particular locality which he represents, and he attempts to put his veto upon the abolition of it. This sort of feeling runs all through the entire Government, until somebody has shrewdly said that perhaps this is the only Government in the world where each Representative in Congress considers it his duty to get out of the Treasury all that he can for some local purpose and to keep out of the Treasury all that has already been gotten out. It is almost impossible to bring about any economy in any way.

That these pension agencies are absolutely useless is the burden even of the argument as made for them, because there has not been an argument made for them which undertakes to show that their existence is any more advantageous or any more economical than would be attending to the business in Washington. All that has been said in favor of them is to attempt to prove that they are not much less economical and that the advantage would be equal as to the locality of attending to the governmental affair at stake. I do not think that we ought to stand in the way of the recommendations of the department.

One other word, Mr. President. It seems to be taken for granted in this body that whenever the representatives of the people—not of the States—attempt to put reformative legislation upon an appropriation bill, they are committing some sort of treason to the Senate. I have said it several times, but I can not too often repeat it, that the only way in which popular government has ever been inaugurated or ever preserved anywhere was by putting reformatory legislation upon appropriation bills, and putting it there in that House which represented the people directly. There is no other way of coercing the other branch of the Government; and the coercive power of the purse was placed in the House of Commons, with us in the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives is our House of Commons for that express purpose. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that merely because a provision upon an appropriation bill is new legislation, therefore the House placing it there ought to have the burden of proof against it. The thing, after all, is to consider the merit of the propbsition. If it be meritorious, then it ought to pass; if it be in any way harmful and detrimental to the public service, then it ought not to pass; but the argument that it ought to go out because our House of Commons had placed it upon an appropriation bill is an argument made in contempt of all history. For my part, I hope the Senate will agree to the House provision and will permit these useless pension agencies to be abolished.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I shall vote to agree to the conference report and then I shall make a motion, if some one else does not do so, that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, and 5, upon which there is a disagreement.

Last week the Senator from North Dakota introduced a joint resolution appropriating $30,000,000, to be at once available, because, as is stated in the preamble to the joint resolution, there is not enough money by that amount to pay the pensioners on account of pensions now due. The pension appropriation bill carrying $158,000,000 passed the House in February last and passed the Senate on the 4th day of May, three months ago. Whose fault is it that there is no money provided for the payment of the pensions? I do not agree to what is stated in the preamble of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator. The amount lacking is $9,000,000, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior and according to the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions, whom we had before our committee this morning. If we want the pensioners to have their pensions, if you take notice of what has been said in the House of Representatives, we have got to recede. Said by whom? Not only by the leader on the Democratic side, but by the leader on the Republican side. It is not a party measure, because the Republicans and Democrats of the House of Representatives, speaking for the people, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has said, have united in their judgment upon this matter that the pension agencies are an extravagance and an expense to this Government that ought not to be longer incurred; that they are no longer necessary for the efficient administration of the affairs of the Pension Office; and there was read in the RECORD the testimony of the Commissioner of Pensions that there would be a saving to the taxpayers of the Nation of more than $250,000 a year by their abolition.

Are we to toss this back and forth and do nothing for the pensioners of this country? Both Houses have passed the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions. The House sent the bill over here and we sent it back to them with certain amendments. Shall we send it back to the House again when, according to the notice given us, they will not agree to the Senate proposition? Shall we send it back again in the face of that fact? What is the wise and proper thing for us to do today? If we want the pensioners to have their money, the wise thing to do is to adopt my motion to recede from the Senate amendments. What are the two or three amendments from which we should recede? They involve the abolition of the 18 pension agencies scattered over the country. Their abolition has been recommended by the Department of the Interior, and a provision providing for their abolishment has been passed by a Republican House of Representatives in two or three Congresses. By abolishing the agencies we will eliminate the rent paid for pension agencies. It is true it amounts to only $4,000, but that is quite a sum when we consider the fact that we have public buildings in various places throughout the United States. It will also involve a saving of $385,000 in clerk hire in the various pension agencies, which the Commissioner of Pensions says are not needed; so that the only difference between the House and Senate is whether we will stand here and insist on something against which the department has recommended and against which both the Republican and Democratic Parties in the other House have recommended. Are we to insist on these amendments holding on to these 18 agencies at a useless expense because some Senators want to keep them in their own States? That is the question and the only question before us. I say, Senators, that if you recede from these amendments, in 24 hours there will be $158,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States to pay the pensioners. Shall we send the conference report back again and deprive the pensioners of this money which is justly due them?

The Senator from North Dakota says they are $30,000,000 short in the necessary amount for the payment of pensions. By mistake he included the payments due on the 4th of September. By that time the amount would reach $30,000,000. The vouchers are sent out on the 4th day of the month, and there is now a deficiency of $9,000,000 to pay them. The pensioners are entitled to this money, and they can get every dollar that is coming to them if the Senate will recede. Should we deprive the pensioners of their money by insisting upon the Senate amendments in order to retain 18 pension agencies?

Will we insist on a disagreement between the Senate and the House when we have notice that the House is tired of sending this provision over here time and time again and when the administration in power, through the proper officer recommends the abolition of the agencies? The House has sent over such a provision in several previous Congresses; they have sent it to us again this year, and by insisting on its amendments the Senate prevents the pensioners from drawing the money that is justly due them.

So, Mr. President, I say it is an easy matter for us to settle this question and let the pensioners get their money without doing the unprecedented thing of the Senate inaugurating an appropriation bill calling for an appropriation of $30,000,000 and sending it to the House, instead of letting the House inaugurate the appropriation bill, as is the invariable custom, and send it here. The House will never consent to such a proceeding.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. We could settle all the appropriation bills on that basis by yielding to the House and adjourn to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but we do not yield on great questions. The question here is whether or not we ought to yield in this instance. The bill has been in conference since the 4th day of May last and both parties in the House of Representatives—the Democratic and Republican—say they will never stand for the Senate amendment. The leader of the House says that the pension agencies ought to be abolished, and that the House will never recede from its position. If that is so—and we have that notice—if we want the pensioners to get their money let us recede, and they will have every dollar of it very shortly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is noticeable that most of those gentlemen in the other House who were so belligerent are not on the conference committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I take it for granted that they speak the voice of their conferees.

Mr. GALLINGER. They speak their own opinions, and it is not the first time they have done so.

Mr. OVERMAN. The conferees have not yielded, although the bill has been in conference for months. May, June, and July have passed and they are still holding out. I do not know anything about the matter, but probably many conferences have been held.

Now, let us see whether the pension agencies are necessary or not. I am going to read from the statement of the former Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Warner, who was a good administrator in that office. I believe I have heard him very highly complimented in this Chamber, and I want to read from some testimony he gave before the committee in the House.

As far back as 1906 he was before the Committee on Appropriations of the House and gave the following evidence:

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I would like to ask the commissioner what is the necessity of having 18 pension agencies.

Mr. WARNER. None whatever. They should be reduced to 6. That could be done by an Executive order.

He said later:

If I had the power, I would decrease the number of agencies in the United States to 6.

Mr. KEIFER. Who can do that?

Mr. WARNER. The President can do it by an Executive order.

These men were put in by Executive order, I think the Senator from North Dakota said, and they can be removed by Executive order. But suppose the President does not do so; then it is the duty, I think, if they are useless, for Congress to refuse to appropriate for them. The Commissioner of Pensions said if he had the power he would decrease the number. In January, 1907, Mr. Warner, the Commissioner of Pensions, also said:

I have no complaint to make of the organization, or laws, or anything else, so far as that is concerned. There is only one point, that is the question of the agencies for the payment of pensions throughout the United States. That is within the control of the President, as to the number of them. There are now 18, and I think it would be good policy to reduce the number to 9, anyway.

Mr. GARDNER. Have you any recommendation to make in that respect?

Mr. WARNER. It is entirely within the control of the President. I recommend that the number be reduced from 18 to 9, but of course it is an embarrassing proposition. There are 18 agents, at $4,000 salary each, scattered around over the United States, and Senators and Representatives are interested in them, etc. You do not have to tell a Member of Congress what that means. I think it would be economy in policy to reduce the number to 9. It could be reduced to 6.

Mr. BROWNLOW. Do you think that would improve the efficiency of the service?

Mr. WARNER. I think it would benefit the efficiency of the service, because you can do business better with 1 man than with 3, and you can do business better with 9 than with 18 agencies. You can enforce policies better with 9 than 18. The checks and vouchers would be made all the same then. As it is now we have separate checks for each agency with the agent's name printed in them and a separate voucher for each agency.

Then, on January 27, 1908, Commissioner Warner also said:

As far as I personally am concerned it would be better for me if the agencies should remain just as they are, as their consolidation would make me additional responsibility and labor. But looking at it from a business point of view and as it it were my own business, I would consolidate them instantly, or as soon as it could be done. It would be more economical for the Government and it would work better than to have these agencies scattered all over the country. The work would go smoother, mistakes could be corrected more quickly, information obtained at once, and the record kept in better shape.

Gen. Keifer, who was an old veteran and then a Member of the House, favored abolishing these useless offices.

On page 5 is the item for the salaries of 18 agents for the payment of pensions, at $4,000 each, $72,000. That would be the same as before?

Mr. WARNER. Yes. I wish you could knock them down to 9.

Mr. BOWERS. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. WARNER. You would do it in a moment if it was your own business.

That is what the commissioner said—"You would do it in a moment if it was your own business."

You take New Hampshire and Maine and Massachusetts—three little agencies up there that would not make a vest pocketful, hardly.

I did not intend to refer to New Hampshire. I did not know I was coming to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. On February 5, 1910, the present Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Davenport, appeared before the committee and testified as follows:

Mr. KEIFER. If you care to state, will you please say whether you think it would be advisable to pay all of these pensions at one agency from Washington?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think it would be in the interest of economy.

Here you have the Commissioner of Pensions, the Secretary of the Interior, and both parties in the House of Representatives uniting in asking for the abolition of the agencies; pensioners all over the country are without their money, and the provision for their payment is $9,000,000 short. The Senate has the opportunity to recede from its amendments striking out the provision which has passed the House of Representatives three times and which has been recommended by two Republican administrations. If you will recede from the Senate amendment, in 24 hours, I repeat, the pensioners will get their money, and there will be no harm to anybody, because the agents have been fed at the public crib long enough and are useless.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the receding be done on the other side, we will not have to wait 24 hours; we can get the matter disposed of in 24 minutes. It is simply a question, after all, as to which side ought to recede. I agree entirely with the Senator from Mississippi that if the pension agencies ought to be abolished, then we ought to recede; if they ought not to be abolished, then we ought not to recede. If it is a question whether it is a character of legislation not necessarily germane to an appropriation bill, then the equities at least would be on our side.

Mr. President, I know what the Commissioner of Pensions and others have stated under examination with reference to this matter. I know what they have stated also on a further cross-examination before the Senate committee upon the question of saving and how it would be made. Let us remember, in considering the question of cost, that the salaries paid to clerks in the pension agencies outside of Washington range, I think, from 20 to 40 per cent less than they do in Washington—I am giving the average—and the work accomplished by each of the clerks outside of Washington will range about from 40 to 50 per cent more than in the city of Washington, according to the way they are being worked now. Then, with from 20 to 30 per cent higher salaries and with from 30 to 40 per cent less efficiency in labor, I can scarcely comprehend how there is going to be any great saving by transferring the work of the pension agencies from the country to the city.

But that is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from North Carolina says that this matter has been before the committee for some time and that the bill was passed by the House in January or February. It does not make any difference when it was passed. We had sufficient time to consider it and to arrive at an agreement before the 1st day of July. We have had it under consideration in the neighborhood of two months, but so far we have been unable to agree.

In connection with the question of saving, we have other things to consider than the mere matter of the salaries of the agents. We adopted an amendment a few days ago to one of the appropriation bills providing for 300 extra clerks, I believe, for the Pension Office. We have a provision in another bill, I think, for about 175 temporary clerks and perhaps 300 more permanent clerks, or as many as may be necessary, in the Census Office.

Where are you to put them? Have you stopped to consider that? Where are these people to do their work? We have not room here at the present time. Here are all the clerks in 16 agencies, where not one dollar of rent is being paid. You are to bring those clerks to the city of Washington. They can not perform their services out on the street. You must make room for them, and you have to rent buildings for them, and the experience we have had in renting buildings in the city of Washington for governmental purposes ought to cause any Senator to pause a long time and consider whether there is not some other way, so as to avoid the payment of these extortionate rents.

You have to provide for the extra 300 clerks and all of those from the several agencies who may be brought here to perform their services.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator from North Dakota doubt the accuracy of the statement of Commissioner Garfield to the effect that it would not be necessary to rent any buildings—that there is ample space in the Pension Building for these records and what other clerks were necessary?

Mr. McCUMBER. Commissioner who?

Mr. BRYAN. Secretary Garfield.

Mr. McCUMBER. At what time?

Mr. BRYAN. In 1907, in his report to the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Government service has grown since 1907. I have the present statement from the officials of the Pension Department, brought right up to date.

Mr. BRYAN. The pension service has not grown to any great extent.

Mr. McCUMBER. We are adding 300 clerks. We have already provided for them; and then you have to take care of those at present in the service at the 18 agencies and bring them here, and you have to provide room for them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator if he does not admit that most of this increase of force to which he has referred is of a temporary character?

Mr. McCUMBER. That employment, even if it is of a temporary character, will last a year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose it does.

Mr. McCUMBER. You will have to rent space for a year. It does not make any difference whether it is temporary or not, the clerks can not perform their duties outside of a building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We can easily take care of those few people from the agencies during that time, and after the temporary force is out there will be plenty of room in the Pension Building.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no. There is no room for them now. We have had to crowd the Indian Office over into the Pension Office, and to-day it is being crowded out of there to make room for the other clerks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, the lack of room, to which the Senator refers, would not be due to the removal of the employees from the pension agencies hither, but is due to the appointment of these extra clerks for this present emergency?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have here a statement by one of the officials, speaking of the 300 extra clerks, and he says:

> If the provision for extra clerks which has been adopted by the Senate in the sundry civil bill and which was adopted by a vote of the House, prevails, it would be impossible almost to find room for these clerks to work in the Pension Bureau Building, as so much of the space there is occupied by the Indian Office, and the Indian Office would probably have to be moved out and another building rented. If these 300 clerks were appointed, and then the pension agencies were abolished and all brought to Washington, as is proposed by the House of Representatives, it would require some two or three hundred additional clerks, and with present conditions in the Pension Bureau and congestion of work there there is no question but that it would cause a great deal of confusion and inconvenience, and would delay the payment of pensions. If the pension agencies are continued for another year—> the congestion in the Pension Bureau will have been pretty well cleaned up by those 300 extra clerks, and at that time if it is decided to discontinue the agencies they might be brought in without inconvenience.

And this answers the question of the Senator—

But during the ensuing year, with all these extra clerks, we have to make provision for housing them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that during that year the Indian Bureau employees could be very comfortably housed in the Maltby Building.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know. We are still using this building. I am doubtful whether we could use the Maltby Building for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is ample room.

Mr. McCUMBER. Have the Senators stopped to consider another thing which bears upon the question of economy, and that is the extra number of post-office clerks who would be required in the city of Washington to handle the mail that is sent out to about 800,000 pensioners? This extra work is to-day distributed over 18 agencies, and the present post offices at the points where those agencies are located are able, without additional help, to handle that mail.

I do not suppose, and I do not think any other Senator believes, that if we should discontinue these agencies we would dismiss any of the clerical force in the post offices in the cities where the agencies are now established. But when you increase the mail in the one city of Washington by the amount of mail that goes out to nearly a million people, you must necessarily have additional clerks at the post office here to take care of that mail. I do not remember the exact number that it was estimated would be necessary, but it was a considerable number.

Mr. President, I say again that we could not accomplish anything in the matter of economy. I am willing to concede that others are equally as strongly convinced that we would save something by the abolition of these agencies. But the Senate conferees have acted in the best of faith and have attempted to bridge over this gulf that divided them from the House, and we have advanced far more than halfway in our propositions.

As has already been suggested, all but three or four at least, of these agencies were created by Executive order under a general law for that purpose. Some three or four of them were created by special law. Undoubtedly the President of the United States, upon the recommendation of the proper department, could abolish any of those agencies which were created by Executive order if he thought that the economic administration of the Government required it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that President Cleveland did reduce the number of the agencies to some extent?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think probably he did. I do not remember. I could not speak positively about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a fact.

Mr. McCUMBER. But here is a question of abolishing these agencies now. It is stated that the departments have recommended that these agencies be abolished. It is stated that the Commissioner of Pensions favors that proposition. If he does favor that proposition, and that can be established to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, then the proposed amendment which the Senate conferees have offered would result in the abolition of all of those agencies, and in order to bring the two Houses together we have submitted propositions and counterpropositions for some considerable time. The last one which I was requested to reduce to writing and submit to the conferees on the part of the House and on the part of the Senate reads as follows, after allowing the provision relating to the appropriation for the agents to remain in:

> Provided, however, That after the 1st day of March, 1913, the President of the United States shall inquire—

It is made his duty under this to inquire—> into the propriety of abolishing any or all of said pension agencies, and if after such inquiry and investigation he shall conclude that the economical and efficient administration of the pension laws requires the discontinuance or consolidation of any such agency or agencies, he is hereby authorized and directed to discontinue and abolish any or all of such agencies, or to consolidate any two or more of them, as in his judgment the best interest of the service may require.

Now, a number of us—and a majority of the Senate, I think—insist that there will be no economy in the abolition of these agencies. I agree that the majority of the House insists that there will be a considerable economy in their abolition. If the President is compelled to investigate this, if he is compelled to act upon the suggestion of his department, as he undoubtedly would, then we have met the contention that the President would not act unless compelled to, and have put in motion the necessary investigation that will result in the abolition of these agencies if they ought to be abolished.

Now, I think when we have gone that far and are willing to submit to the very departments themselves and to the President in the future, after a thorough investigation in the department, in which every matter of saving and expense could be taken into consideration—after we have provided for the submission of that to the President and given him authority and directed him to act in accordance with the results of his investigation, then it seems to me we have gone as far as we ought to be asked to go, and the House should meet us at this point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he really thinks that his proposition authorizes the President to do anything or directs him to do anything except what he is already authorized by law to do, and directed by duty to the public service to do, and which he has hitherto failed to do?

Mr. McCUMBER. He is now neither authorized nor is he directed in any way to abolish those agencies created by law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that leaves those agencies entirely outside of the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President, there are only four of those, I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. He has undoubtedly, as I have already said, authority to abolish or to consolidate the other agencies; that is, that implied power follows from the power granted to him to create them as in his judgment might be necessary for the expedition of the pension laws——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; take the agencies which were not created by Executive order.

Mr. McCUMBER. It might possibly be that those were the particular agencies, if any, that should be abolished, or that should be first considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if I am correct an Executive has a right to order an inquiry at any time for the purpose of determining whether the things that he himself has created ought to be abolished or not. So he has a right to order the inquiry. He has a right to abolish the agencies.

Mr. McCUMBER. Some Senators have questioned whether he would do it. We make it imperative that he shall do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; you merely make it imperative that he shall have an inquiry.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator failed to catch the meaning of the words I read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I did not properly catch that.

Mr. McCUMBER. He is at first required to make the inquiry and the investigation, and—if, after such inquiry and investigation, he shall conclude that the economical and efficient administration of the pension laws requires the discontinuance or consolidation of any such agency or agencies, he is hereby authorized and directed to discontinue and abolish—

And so forth, as the case may be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was evidently mistaken about the last wording there. But the only difference then would be that as regards those agencies which he has himself created he would have no greater power than he has now, while, if I understand your amendment, with regard to those created by law, the amendment would confer additional power.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would confer additional power with reference to those, and compel him to act upon the others.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am so extremely anxious to have this conference report disposed of, as well as the one of which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has charge, that if I had a disposition to occupy much time in this discussion I would forego it. I will engage the attention of the Senate for only a few minutes.

I was quite surprised a day or two ago to pick up a local newspaper and find in it a statement that, in conjunction with my colleague, I was holding up the pension appropriation bill. At that time I had scarcely thought about the bill, and certainly I had not said a word about it to any one of the conferees. I had done nothing whatever in reference to it, either to hold it up or to promote its passage, because it was in the hands of other Senators, and I thought they were quite competent to deal with it.

The newspaper further said—and that has been repeated here to-day—that there were political considerations back of the opposition to this bill, which, to say the least, is absurd. There is an agency in my own city, and it is a well-conducted agency. A soldier, a man who served with distinction in two wars, is at the head of it. He is an old man, but a very efficient man; and I believe there are in that office five or six clerks. The chief clerk is a Democrat of Democrats. He certainly could not help me politically; the rest, I believe, are women; and I never have appealed to women to render me any assistance in my political campaigns. So there is no politics in the matter, so far as New Hampshire is concerned, and I apprehend that is the case in the other States.

In almost every one of these agencies an old soldier is the pension agent, most of whom are men well advanced in life; and I submit to you, Senators, who are so solicitous for the clerks in the departments, who are so unwilling that a clerk shall be thrown out of employment in Washington without having a hearing, that they might well pause and give consideration to the question whether or not they want to throw out of employment 17 old soldiers who happen to occupy these positions.

Those men deserve quite as much consideration as the ordinary clerk, either in the Pension Office here or in any other department of the Govermnent in this city, and we all know how solicitous public men are, how solicitous the President of the United States is, and how solicitous the heads of the executive departments are that these clerks shall be protected in the places which they now hold, and that they shall not be thrown out on the charities of the world. Indeed, it is being argued in high quarters that they ought to be protected in office and afterwards pensioned and taken care of as long as they live.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. REED. Are not all these 17 men now pensioned?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not at all agree to the proposition that they are, any more than the Senator from Missouri is pensioned. They are performing the duties of their offices——

Mr. REED. I do not know why the Senator should make that application.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make it understandingly. If those men are pensioned on the ground that they hold public office, we are all pensioned.

Mr. REED. These men will draw pensions under the pension act that has been passed, if they are not already drawing pensions. I ask again if they are not now pensioned.

Mr. GALLINGER. I apologize to the Senator. I did not understand that the Senator had reference to a pension because of Army service.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some of them, I apprehend, do draw pensions for military service. I think the agent in my own city has never applied for a pension, but possibly some of the others have.

Mr. REED. If the Senator means that any man who draws a public salary is a pensioner, and includes himself in that class, that he is a mere pensioner, he can so classify himself. I have always thought that men who held public office and represented the people were not exactly in the class of pensioners. But I refer to the fact that those old soldiers, over whose wrongs and trials the Senator so regularly weeps in this Chamber, are already drawing pensions, and if not large enough to support them, they ought not to be supplemented by a public salary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have yielded as far as I propose to when the Senator from Missouri misrepresents my position and refers to me as weeping over the wrongs and trials of the old soldiers. I have done nothing of that kind. If any weeping has been done on that score, it has been done by others and not by me. However, I am a friend of the soldier under all circumstances.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was a little unfortunate—I believe it was a quotation which he gave us—when he said that the average man in public life wants to get into the Treasury and to get out of the Treasury all he can for his own State or his community. I do not think that is true.

I was on the Committee on Commerce for a great many years, and I did a great deal of work for other Senators, chiefly from the Southern States, in getting appropriations for rivers and harbors. I did not have any appropriations for my own State, but I was very glad to cooperate in getting appropriations for other sections of the country. For the most part they were proper appropriations. There were some that I questioned, but I gave the benefit of the doubt to my associates, and voted for them. I have never secured an appropriation for a public building in a town or city that did not have 10,000 inhabitants. Some of the Senators who are so much troubled about the extravagance in keeping these 17 old soldiers on the pay roll might well ask themselves the question whether or not they have been as careful as that in asking for appropriations for public buildings.

I know we have passed bills carrying as much money in a single instance for a public building in a town having three or four thousand inhabitants, as is involved here, and in some instances having only a few hundred inhabitants, but such buildings are not to be found in New England. If there is extravagance in the pension agencies of the country, there is extravagance to an extent that is scandalous in the matter of appropriating for public buildings in these inconsequential country villages. I have not done it, and I have not purloined any money from the Public Treasury either for such public buildings or for the improvement of rivers that can never be made navigable.

Now, Mr. President, there is no real reform in this matter. In my judgment there will be no economy in it. Take the matter of rentals. We pay out two or three thousand dollars in the city of New York in the matter of rental, but we pay out nothing for that purpose in any of the other places where these agencies are established.

We have in the Pension Office Building to-day a state of congestion. The Indian Office, or a part of it, is in that building, but the Commissioner of Pensions has announced, in view of the fact that we are to employ 300 more clerks, that the Indian Office must leave the building. It will have to go out and rent a building, and Senators all know what it means to rent buildings in the city of Washington. So instead of saving money we will unquestionably lose a good many thousands of dollars in that operation. That certainly will not be a matter of economy.

Now as to the clerks. There are a few clerks in each agency. They are getting small salaries, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, in comparison with salaries paid in Washington. Possibly some of them may be dispensed with, but that is doubtful; but, however that may be, we might well have as much sympathy for those clerks as for the clerks in Washington. If their services are not dispensed with, they will come here and work at shorter hours and larger salaries; which will not be a matter of economy, but a matter of added expense to the Government.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the Senator think that they would be petitioning Congress, after they had been here a year or two, and employing lobbyists to try to get pensions?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course. They will join the army of patriots who are now demanding pensions for all the clerks in all the departments in this city. That will certainly follow. They will not get behind in the procession, so far as the pensions are concerned.

There have been recommendations, and there will doubtless be in the future recommendations, for the abolition of these agencies. Mr. Warner, the gentleman whom the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] quoted with so much approval and earnestness, recommended that half of the agencies should be abolished. Mr. Garfield, who, in the matter of so-called reform, goes everybody one better except his chief, advised that they all be abolished, and that the work should be put under the Commissioner of Pensions, in the Pension Office; and so it goes. Mr. Davenport has been quoted as having approved of it, and yet Mr. Davenport has always been very guarded in any utterance he has made. Evidently he has had very grave doubt in his mind, and, as I quoted from his testimony a little while ago, he said it might be well to try abolishing one agency, and, seeing how it worked out, and if satisfactory, then take up the question of abolishing the others.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say. I have no earthly interest in the matter. I have no special interest in the war veteran who is pension agent in my own city. I have never asked a political favor of him in my life, and never expect to. The soldiers in my State feel that they are better served by having an agency there, and a great many of them have said to me, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested they have said to him, that in the matter of securing pensions they can always go to the agency and get advice and help, and that they are saved some money in that way.

Mr. President, I think we can well allow this matter to rest as it is at least for another year. After a careful investigation by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Pensions, or the proper committees of Congress, we can better judge whether or not it is desirable to make the change. When all the evidence has been collected and all the facts presented to Congress, we can with much greater intelligence and justice to all concerned legislate upon this question than we can at the present time.

Mr. President, I do not think our conferees are censurable for standing out in this matter any more than the House conferees are censurable for standing out on items in this and in all the other appropriation bills. If the conferees on the part of the Senate honestly believe that this is not an economical matter; that it is not in the interest of the soldiers of the country; if that is their conviction, I do not think, however severely they may be criticized in the public press or in another place, that their associates here ought to take them to task and tell them they are not doing the right thing and that they ought to recede. Why should they recede any more than the House, and why should not we stand by our own conferees? I trust, Mr. President, that we will send this matter back to conference and allow our conferees to further try to adjust the differences with the other House. If they again fail, we can then take the matter up at a later date and make such disposition of it as we think wise. I trust the motion of the Senator from North Carolina will not be agreed to.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, we have been told that it is very necessary that this matter should be acted on at once so that the pensions of the soldiers can be promptly paid. In my judgment, if there is anything that will prevent the pensions of the old soldiers from being promptly paid it is this identical legislation insisted upon by the House conferees.

So far as the statements are concerned of Commissioners of Pensions or Secretaries of the Interior in the past as to whether the agencies should be abolished, the conditions which exist now are so very different from the conditions which existed then as to render them valueless. Only a few days ago we authorized the employment of 300 additional clerks to carry out the provisions of the new pension bill, and if we are to bring in addition to them 372 clerks from the agencies to the department in Washington—even conceding the curtailment suggested of 100 clerks—and if we take the time to transport to the city of Washington the immense number of records that are now in these various pension offices, it can amount to nothing more nor less than, as stated in the letter read a few moments ago by the Senator from North Dakota, almost interminable confusion and delay.

If I thought that those who contend with us were right, that this is a measure of economy, I might look upon it with some degree of favor, provided it was not an injury to the old soldiers, but, Mr. President, it is not a measure of economy. If this measure is adopted, it will increase instead of decrease the expenses and do a great injustice to the old veterans.

We have in these various pension offices 472 clerks drawing an average salary of $977.79, making a total of $451,516.88.

We have 17 pension agents with salaries of $4,000 each, making a total of $68,000. The amount of the two is $519,516.88.

It has been said that we can do with a hundred less clerks if these pension agencies are consolidated in Washington. This was said, however, before the passage of the late McCumber bill, and no sane man thinks it can now be done. I do not believe it, for the reason that in the different pension agencies the clerks frequently work until 7 o'clock p. m., that 100 less clerks working in Washington, only until 4 o'clock p. m., can do the work, certainly not in a rapid or satisfactory manner.

But suppose that it is true, when we bring the remainder of these clerks here their salaries, according to the average in the departments, will amount to $1,280.72 each. The clerks who work in Knoxville, for instance, or Louisville, or Columbus, have their homes there, and are able to work at $800 or $700 or $900 a year, but they can not come to Washington and work for the average salary paid for clerks here.

Now, let us take this number of clerks less 100 and we find that even deducting the salary of 100 clerks, it would require $476,427.14 to pay the remainder.

Then, according to the contention made, there would be a saving of $43,089.74.

But let us see what additional expense will be necessary. In the first place we can not bring 672 clerks to Washington without having additional room for them in which to work, because the Pension Office is now crowded, and we can not rent another building for less than $15,000.

In the next place, we will have, necessarily, an increase of 10 clerks in the Post Office Department on account of the immense increase in mailing matter sent out from Washington. These will cost $1,000 apiece, or $10,000. Bear in mind that the cost of each payment from Washington is 63 cents to each pensioner. The average cost of other offices is 56 cents, the excess in Washington being 7 cents. Considering there are 800,000 pensioners, there will be an increase in this respect of $56,000.

Now, when you add that $56,000, 10 clerks at $10,000 in the Post Office, $15,000 for rent, and the cost of removal, $10,000, we have $91,000. That is the additional expense under the present plan proposed by the House.

Take from that amount the $43,897 which will be saved by abolishment of the pension agencies on the basis named, and we have an actual increase of expense to the Government of $48,000. This is true even if 100 clerks are dispensed with, which I am sure can not be done; and if it can not, then the amount of their salaries, $128,072, added to the $48,000, will make a loss to the Government of $176,072.

And this is the economy of the proposition of the House. The approval of the House bill, in addition, will result in turning 17 deserving old soldiers out of office. Not only so, it will result in turning out of office hundreds of clerks who are now serving, because they can not come to Washington and work, even for the increased salaries. These clerks are many of them old soldiers or widows and children of old soldiers.

Another thing, the clerks who are now in the pension offices have acquired great experience. It will take new clerks months and probably years to acquire the experience and do the work that the present force is doing, and meanwhile the soldiers must bear the brunt.

Another matter, Mr. President, whenever we remove this vast quantity of records from all over the country we run the risk of loss by fire and otherwise. We entail an enormous amount of labor. We delay pensioners in the collecting of their money. The loss of papers may work great hardship in the future.

When these agencies were established, Mr. President, there were fewer pensioners than there are to-day. If there was a necessity for these agencies then, there is surely greater necessity for them now. Why this measure of false economy should be insisted on I am unable to see. It does nobody any good; it injures instead of relieves the soldiers; it increases the expense instead of diminishing it; and it prevents the soldiers from prompt payment of pensions.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote against the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe the pending question is upon my motion that the Senate insist upon its amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it is first on agreeing to the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only question now before the Senate is on agreeing to the conference report. The Chair will have it again read if desired.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that is necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the conference report shows an agreement as to some items and an inability to agree on others. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand this question does not affect really the general subject which has been under discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But that will come up later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not, as there are some items on which the conferees agree. It does not affect the question which may be subsequently submitted on which there is a disagreement. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether the Senator from North Dakota heard a motion I gave notice of—that I would move to recede. But I yield to the Senator if he desires to make another motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that I made the motion, and I asked that it be laid aside until we disposed of the conference report. My motion was that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the House bill still in disagreement and that a further conference be appointed on behalf of the Senate by the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move as a substitute for that motion that the Senate recede from amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, and 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate further insist upon its amendments still in disagreement. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate recede from its amendments. The motion to recede has precedence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is a very important question. I think there ought to be at least a quorum of the Senate present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bryan	Cullom	Johnston, Ala.
Bacon	Burnham	Cummins	Kern
Bankhead	Burton	Dillingham	La Follette
Bourne	Catron	Fall	Lodge
Bradley	Chamberlain	Gallinger	McCumber
Brandegee	Clapp	Gronna	McLean
Bristow	Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, Me.	Martin, Va.
Martine, N. J.	Perkins	Smith, Ga.	Thornton
Massey	Pomerene	Smith, Md.	Townsend
Nelson	Root	Smith, Mich.	Warren
Newlands	Sanders	Smith, S. C.	Watson
Overman	Shively	Smoot	Wetmore

Penrose	Smith, Ariz.	Swanson	Works

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is absent from the city. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 56 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the Chair restate the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was first made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a further conference. Pending that motion the Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate recede from its amendments upon which there is a difference between the two Houses. The latter motion has the precedence of the two, and therefore that question will be first put.

Mr. OVERMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, of course, if the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] prevails, the House provision for the abolition of these pension agencies will go into effect immediately on the approval of the bill by the President. While it is not my purpose to detain the Senate by discussion on the merits of the controversy that has arisen on this provision, it should be noted before this vote is taken that language which was quite suitable in the House provision when the bill passed the House months ago may not be suitable now. This provision was considered in both House and Senate with reference to the appropriations carried by the bill becoming effective at the beginning of the present fiscal year. This is true both of the appropriations for pensions and the appropriations to defray the expense of administration. The bill did not become law before the beginning of the present fiscal year. Had it become law in May or June, with the House provision in it, no difficulty or little difficulty, so far as administration is concerned, would have ensued. But we have entered on the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. Over a month of the year has expired. The language of the House provision contemplated the provision going into effect July 1, 1912. It is too late for that language to be given effect in the full sense in which it was adopted. I suggest that to adopt the pending motion without qualification is to leave the situation with reference to these agencies in the air. If a conclusion should be eventually reached to abolish the agencies, the time of their termination should be fixed far enough ahead to give reasonable opportunity to wind them up and make the required transfers to Washington. When the provision was adopted by the House it fixed a time in the future when the agencies should terminate. To now adopt the same House provision, as is sought by the pending motion, is to fix the termination of the agencies as of five weeks in the past.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to recede from the Senate amendments. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I only desire to say that in voting "nay" on this motion I am but voicing the wishes of most of the pensioners in the State of Michigan, who have personally memorialized me to oppose the abolishment of the pension agency at Detroit, who have been accustomed to doing business there, and who have, by petition and otherwise, asked that that office shall not be abolished. For that reason I propose to vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to recede from the amendments of the Senate. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). In accordance with my previous announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST (when Mr. MYERS's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). On account of the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am informed that I may transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and will do so and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WETMORE. I announce the general pair of my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I make this announcement for the day. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I transferred my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], but, inasmuch as the Senator from Florida has appeared and voted, I desire to withdraw my vote, and will let my general pair stand.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Ashurst	Johnston, Ala.	Reed	Stone
Bankhead	Jones	Simmons	Swanson
Bryan	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.	Thornton
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Tillman

So Mr. OVERMAN's motion that the Senate recede from its amendments was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that the Senate further insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and ask for a further conference with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask, Mr. President, that the same conferees be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the same conferees be appointed, and it will be so ordered. The Chair appoints the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] as the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Finance Committee at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks, out of order, leave to make a report at this time. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred House bill 25034, entitled an act reducing the duties on manufactures of cotton, to report with a negative recommendation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to state in this connection that the minority and majority have reserved the right to file reports later, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I understand, will have a report of his own to submit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go to the calendar in accordance with the rule, unless there be objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire if we can not agree upon a day to vote upon this measure? I would suggest a unanimous-consent agreement to take up this measure on next Friday and vote upon it.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will ask unanimous consent that we vote on this bill next Friday before the expiration of the calendar day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I send to the desk a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall have to object to unanimous consent, unless it is made secondary to reports from conference committees and appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the request for unanimous consent submitted by the Senator from North Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, August 9, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce duties on manufactures of cotton; and before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator if he will not make it at a certain hour in the afternoon, say 5 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. That will be satisfactory. I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] is very anxious to get through with the Post Office appropriation bill, and desires that the request for unanimous consent be changed.

Mr. BOURNE. I will ask the Senator if he will not make it Monday instead of Friday?

Mr. SIMMONS. Would Saturday suit the Senator?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we might as well save a little time. I will not consent to the request for unanimous consent until the Panama Canal bill is out of the way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal bill be voted on, say, on Thursday. That is a bill that ought to be disposed of before we adjourn. It has long been the regular order, and I think its friends are entitled to have a vote upon it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal bill be voted on next Friday. Then the Senator from North Carolina can renew his request for Saturday.

Mr. WARREN. Let it be the calendar day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will change the request to Saturday, if that will suit the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BOURNE. I would prefer to have it Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible for the reporters to hear Senators who interchange their views in a conversational tone. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Pending the request of the Senator from North Carolina, I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal bill shall be voted on before the Senate adjourns on Friday next.

Mr. SIMMONS. Make it the calendar day.

Mr. BAILEY. During the calendar day, of course; I did not state "the legislative day."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request made by the Senator from Texas.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, August 9, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, and that before adjournment on that calendar day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, unless that is accompanied with an agreement that we may take up the canal bill on Thursday, I can not consent to it. It is impossible to predict at this time how much debate will ensue upon its various provisions.

Mr. BAILEY. I would say to the Senator that it is within his power to have it taken up by demanding the regular order, and that will bring it up on Thursday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not want, however, to be subjected to that contingency, and I think that must be the view of a good many here. I think we ought to have at least two days for the consideration of the canal bill. We have not touched in the debate upon a single subject in the bill. I should like to see it disposed of; and if we can take it up on Thursday morning, under unanimous consent, and hold it under consideration until disposed of, I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. BAILEY. Would this suit the Senator from Iowa: That we take it up immediately after the routine morning business on Friday and then vote on it before adjournment on Saturday? That would give him two days.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, all I ask is two days for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the pardon of the Senator from Connecticut. I was simply trying to help him, and not trying to take his bill out of his hands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I appreciate that, and I am only too glad to have the aid of the Senator from Texas. I simply rose to express my entire willingness and earnest hope that the unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Texas may be granted, for I think in two days we can do justice to the bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I had expected to make some remarks upon the canal bill at the proper time, but I agree with the Senator from Iowa that if a vote on the bill is fixed for one day, and only that one day is given for debate, it will certainly not give opportunity for some of us who desire to speak to be heard. For that reason I join in the request that at least two days be given for debate.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will ask the Senator to modify the request so as to provide for two days and dispose of the bill on Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, August 9, 1912, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone; and that before adjournment on the calendar day of Saturday, August 10, 1912, the Senate will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator from Texas whether he would not consent to fixing an hour to vote on Saturday—any reasonable hour—say, 6 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that would provoke some objection, because it might happen that we could conclude the debate by sitting a little late, and in that way let every Senator have an opportunity fairly to express himself; and we will not be apt to do anything else Saturday, except as to conference reports and such business as that. I hope the Senator from Utah will not insist upon the suggestion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall not insist upon it; but I think we might fix an hour to vote. I do not think there is a particle of sense in our sitting here until 12 o'clock at night, as we did upon a prior occasion.

Mr. CUMMINS. The proposed agreement is satisfactory now, with this addition, that the bill be taken up immediately after the routine morning business on Saturday. That is not provided for in the agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is understood.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the unanimous-consent request be again reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again report it.

The Secretary again read the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. That includes the suggestion——

Mr. LODGE. That cuts out the routine morning business on Saturday.

Mr. BAILEY. That includes the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa—to the exclusion of the routine morning business on Saturday.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not so understand it, and I made the inquiry of the Chair if the agreement was adopted would the bill be taken up automatically Saturday morning to the exclusion of morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the order as just read would require the Senate to continue in its consideration of the measure from the time it was taken up Friday until it was finally disposed of on Saturday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Without interruption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without interruption.

Mr. CUMMINS. With that understanding and with that interpretation of the agreement, I am satisfied.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask for information. I very much want to have an agreement and have this matter disposed of. I want to ask whether it will exclude—it strikes me that it will unless we make an exception—the appointment of conferees, and so forth. We are now here with only four of the appropriation bills signed by the President out of the 13 or 14 annual bills. For instance, suppose the Committee on Pensions were ready to make a report; it would take five minutes; or a bill comes over as to which we would wish to ask that conferees be appointed. It seems to me that in the agreement it ought to be provided that conference reports and the appointment of conferees, and so forth, at least, should be taken care of. Of course if there were a morning hour, it could be done within that. I suggest that modification to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would it satisfy the Senator if there were added to the request the words "this agreement does not, however, exclude the presentation of conference reports and the appointment of conferees."

Mr. WARREN. I should be glad, of course, to except appropriation bills, but now I am only making this point. We can at least have these reports presented. I shall make no objection to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the suggestion I have offered meet the views of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I think it will be all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Connecticut should add "without debate."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, of course——

Mr. CUMMINS. Otherwise we might be engaged all day in the consideration of a conference report, as we have been today.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Texas as it stands unquestionably cuts out the consideration of conference reports. I am perfectly willing to have the words "without debate" added to the addition I suggested; that conference reports may be presented and conferees appointed, without debate.

Mr. WARREN. I think there will be no question about that. Some one might ask a question of the Senator making the motion. But, of course, consideration like the one that is now inflicted on the conferees is not expected to occur.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I ask is that debate be excluded, so that if Senators desire to proceed with the discussion of the canal bill, they will not be prevented from so doing by a long debate over a conference report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is a wise provision, for somebody might want conferees appointed by the Senate instead of by the Chair, and that might lead to debate; and I should like to have the words "without debate" included in the agreement.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not consent to this agreement unless it is made for the legislative day, because this I regard as the most important bill before Congress, or that has been during this session, and I am not willing to have its consideration cut off before it is finished. There are a number of very important matters in it, and we may be able to get through by Saturday night, and I hope we will be, but I can not take any chance of having a full consideration of every section of this bill interfered with. I must ask that the unanimous-consent request be so modified that the vote shall be taken upon the legislative day of Friday. Then when we get through we are through.

Mr. LODGE. That makes the agreement worthless.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is better than to encounter an objection. If we can get through that day, it will take care of the matter. If we can not get through that day, we will be in no worse condition than we would be under the objection of the Senator from Kansas, and, consequently, rather than have the request defeated by that objection, I will say "the legislative day of Saturday."

Mr. WARREN. I can not consent to a legislative day that may last a week or longer, unless——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will be in no better condition.

Mr. WARREN. Very well; unless it shall be subject to the consideration of conference reports and appropriation bills.

Mr. BAILEY. That is understood.

Mr. WARREN. No. That has not been understood.

Mr. BAILEY. That has been agreed to and will be a part of the order, if the order is agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. No; only as to the presentation of a report without debate. We have here the Army bill, which must be passed; we have here the Post Office appropriation bill, which must be passed——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas demands the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is known as the Panama Canal bill. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROOT, Mr. LODGE, Mr. WILLIAMS, and others. Question!

Mr. LODGE. State the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Let the first amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that several committee amendments have not yet been acted upon.

Mr. LODGE. Let the first committee amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which the Secretary will proceed to do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. Let the amendment be reported. I ask that the first amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Secretary is about to do.

Mr. LODGE. I think I have a right to have that done before anybody else is recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. When a request is made by a Senator occupying the floor that an amendment be stated, he has a right to have the amendment reported before any other Senator is recognized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not know for what purpose the Senator from Connecticut rose. It might have been a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. He did not say so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know. If the Senator rose to a point of order, it is the duty of the Chair to recognize him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If Senators desire to speak upon the bill before it is read for committee amendments, have they the privilege to do so?

Mr. LODGE. The bill as a whole has been read and is now open for amendment, and I ask that the first amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My inquiry was, Whether Senators have a right to discuss the bill, as they have been doing, until the amendment has been stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill being before the Senate a Senator has the right to discuss it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I asked the question because two Senators, who are members of the committee, inform me that they desire to speak and have prepared speeches. I did not want them cut off if it was possible for them to make their remarks——

Mr. LODGE. There is no rule in the Senate about general debate as there is in the House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think I used the term "general debate." I spoke of Senators discussing the bill as a whole, irrespective of the particular amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I think we have reached a stage in the Senate where we can act on the amendments. If Senators desire to address the Senate, they should be here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They are here.

Mr. LODGE. Then let them speak. They can speak just as well on the amendment as on the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if Senators desire to speak I assume they will. The Senator from Washington advised me he was ready to proceed. The Senator from Louisiana said he would like to say a few brief words on the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can we not take up the bill section by section and dispose of the amendments?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing. The bill has been read.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can take it up section by section.

Mr. LODGE. We do not have to vote on each section unless there is an amendment to it. I ask for the reading of the first amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first committee amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, in section 1, page 2, line 1, before the word "excluding," to strike out "excepting," and in line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "Falmenco" and insert "Flamenco," so as to read:

That the zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal now being constructed thereon, which zone begins in the Caribbean Sea three marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of three marine miles from mean low-water mark, excluding therefrom the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors located within said zone, as excepted in the treaty with the Republic of Panama dated November 18, 1903, but including all islands within said described zone, and in addition thereto the group of islands in the Bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 22, before the words "by treaty," to strike out "to acquire"; in line 23, before the words "any additional land," to insert "to acquire"; and on page 3, line 2, before the word "exchange," to strike out "may, in like manner" and insert "to," so as to read:

The President is authorized, by treaty with the Republic of Panama, to acquire any additional land or land under water not already granted, or which was excepted from the grant, that he may deem necessary for the operation, maintenance, sanitation, or protection of the Panama Canal, and to exchange any land or land under water not deemed necessary for such purposes for other land or land under water which may be deemed necessary for such purposes, which additional land or land under water so acquired shall become part of the Canal Zone.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 14, after the word "until," to strike out "Congress shall otherwise provide" and insert "the courts provided for in this act shall be established," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That all laws, orders, regulations, and ordinances adopted and promulgated in the Canal Zone by order of the President for the government and sanitation of the Canal Zone and the construction of the Panama Canal are hereby ratified and confirmed as valid and binding until Congress shall otherwise provide. The existing courts established in the Canal Zone by Executive order are recognized and confirmed to continue in operation until the courts provided for in this act shall be established.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 4, line 5, after the word "when," to strike out "in the judgment of the President."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Wait a moment, Mr. President. As I understand, these amendments all hang together, and are necessary to make the amendment proposed by the Senate committee read properly. Are the first amendments unnecessary to the adoption of the principal amendment? Perhaps the chairman would tell me. It seems to me possible that they might all stand together really as one amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, that section 4, now under consideration—on the amendment to it as it came from the House—provided for the government of the Canal Zone by a governor to be appointed by the President, and the amendment adopted by a majority of the Senate committee substituted for that program the establishment of a commission of three to govern the canal.

The Senator is correct in his suggestion, that perhaps before these particular amendments and particular lines of the bill are acted upon separately, it would be more logical to consider the whole scheme—whether it should be by one governor or by a commission of three.

Mr. LODGE. I see on examining the text more closely that the first amendment simply changes the phrase, not leaving it to the judgment of the President, but simply says "when the construction of the Panama Canal shall be completed," which is all right, and to which there is no objection. It does not connect with the other. I have no objection to the first amendment being considered. It seems to me quite proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to state the next amendment, which was, in line 6——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that the bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and if there is any trouble, it can be corrected in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 6, after the words "shall be," to strike out "sufficiently advanced toward completion" and insert "completed so as."

Mr. LODGE. Now, I think that does connect with the rest. No; that is all right. There is no objection to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the language on page 4, line 7, as he suggested to me an amendment that he would like to have appear at that place.

Mr. THORNTON. I have not the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I recall, the Senator from Louisiana wanted that changed.

Mr. THORNTON. What does the chairman of the committee say?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator will remember that he came to me and requested that when page 4 of the bill was reached, in line 7, in lieu of the words recommended by the committee to be inserted, to wit, "completed so as," there should be inserted the words "completed, thereby rendering."

Mr. THORNTON. The chairman of the committee is correct, but since I told him that—some days afterwards—an amendment was filed in the name of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] by his colleague covering that ground. I then knew nothing of his intention to do that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know that was the fact; the amendment was printed; but I did not see the Senator from West Virginia here to offer the amendment and so I referred to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. THORNTON. Then I will offer that amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRADLLEY. Are amendments in order on the floor before the amendments offered by the committee are disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the order did not exclude them, and therefore such amendments are in order. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "sufficientiy advanced toward completion to render" and in lieu insert "completed, thereby rendering unnecessary," so that if amended it will read:

SEC. 4. That when the construction of the Panama Canal shall be completed, thereby rendering unnecessary the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, line 9, strike out the word "unnecessary" and insert the words "as now constituted."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the words "as now constituted" ought not to be inserted unless we are going to have a commission of three, because then the President is authorized under the bill as passed by the House to go on as described in the part stricken out. That implies continuing the commission in some form. Personally I am in favor of the House provision as against the triple-headed commission. I think if there is anything on earth that ought to be under the conduct of one responsible head it is that zone and that canal.

I do not care to argue it at length, but I do want to have a vote on that clause before it is disposed of.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, personally I am very much in favor of the amendment which has been submitted by the Senate committee. The construction of the canal has been in charge of a commission consisting of seven members. After it is completed, after the construction work is done, then there will not be needed as large a commission as the present commission. The work is now segregated and subdivided. One commissioner is the chairman of the commission—Col. Goethals. Another commissioner is Col. Hodges, who is the assistant to aid in the construction. Another commissioner is Col. Gorgas, who is in charge of sanitation. Another commissioner is Gov. Thatcher, who is the governor and exercises the civil authority. The other members of the commission are Sibert, Gaillard, and Rousseau, who are engineers engaged in the construction work. After the construction is over there will then be the three departments of government on the zone the same as there are now. At present one commissioner is in charge of sanitation, another commissioner is charged with the civil administration, and five commissioners are engaged in construction; they are engineers. After the construction is completed there will be no need of the five engineers, but there will be need for one engineer who shall have charge of the operation of the canal.

It seems to me that it will be unsafe and unwise to put in charge of one man not only the operation of the canal, which is a technical and professional work, but also the sanitation, which is a department within itself, and the civil government. These three departments of government will be necessary. Those functions will have to be exercised. There is nothing more important than the sanitation of that zone, and for one I am not willing to put into the hands of one man complete control of the operation of the canal, the sanitation of the zone, and the civil administration.

It is the custom, and indeed a growing and popular system of government throughout our country, for the larger municipalities to adopt what is known as the commission form of government. We have the commission form of government here in the District of Columbia and a great many cities have adopted that form. I believe it is a wise form of government. The various departments of municipal government are divided among these commissioners and each commissioner is held responsible for his branch of the service. Reducing the commission from seven to three simply eliminates the unnecessary engineers and retains the commission with its present efficiency, each commissioner performing the responsible duties which he has heretofore performed. It seems to me that it certainly will be the wisest and most desirable form of government.

I know that some of the military officers are anxious that this should be a government of one man who has supreme military authority and that everything else should be subordinate to his wishes and his will, but, in my opinion, we make a grave mistake when we jeopardize the sanitation of this zone by placing that work in the hands of a man whose business it is to operate the canal.

I do not believe that the civil administration there should be placed in the hands of a military officer. There is a strip of land 50 miles long and 10 miles wide. It will be inhabited by thousands of American citizens. The population at the lowest estimate will be somewhere between 20,000 and 30,000. After the employees who are engaged in the construction have been removed and are no longer there, and only those who are used in the operation of the canal, there will be somewhere from 2,500 to 3,500 men, and they and their families will constitute a population of somewhere from 10,000 to 12,000.

Then there are to be towns located; there is to be civil administration; there are to be schools; courts are provided for and different employees; business will be established. There will be a city at each end. Provision is already made for a city on the zone on the Pacific side. For one, I am not willing that that should be exclusively a military government, except as to the operation of the canal; and as far as I am concerned I shall cast my vote and do what I can to have the Senate amendment retained as it is.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand the Senator's position to be that if there were a governor as constituted by the House provision he would necessarily be a military man, or is that discretionary with the President?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think probably that is discretionary with the President. I do not remember just what the House provisions are, but I know the intention of the authorities is that the governor shall be an Army officer, who will be in charge of the operation of the canal, and I am not in favor of providing that the whole civil administration and the sanitation of that Isthmus shall be placed in the hands of the engineer who may be thought the most efficient to superintend the mechanical operation of the canal. I think it is a very grave mistake. You might as well put into the hands of the mayor of a city the entire government of the city where you have a commission form of government.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am sorry to be unable to agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I think he fails to appreciate a very essential consideration in dealing with this subject. Of course, there is, there always has been, and I suppose there always will be, a conflict between two opposing ideas of efficiency and liberty.

We started in this country with a very high development of liberty and government in the original constitution of the State of Pennsylvania—Franklin's idea. That idea prevailed in the old Confederation. The Constitution of the United States was the result of the appreciation of the evils that came from the lack of centralized control, and the pendulum swung over to the other side.

That is going on all the time. You can not have the highest efficiency without concentration of power, concentration of responsibility, and to get that you have to give up something of liberty; you have to surrender something of everybody's right to have his own way in order that you may have efficiency in the highest degree. On the other hand, the universal experience of mankind is that you can not have government in which everybody has his own way and have any degree of efficiency.

Now, that same old question comes up about the Panama Canal. It seems to me, sir, that the American people never have been engaged in any enterprise which called for organization with a view to the highest possible efficiency as does the operation of the Panama Canal, except when we were engaged in war. When we are engaged in war, by common consent the right of individual participation in saying what shall be done in the direction of affairs is surrendered to one single commander. That is because you can not carry on war successfully in any other way.

We have a commission engaged in the construction of the Panama Canal. The work has been done admirably; a very high degree of efficiency has been attained. If you will observe the personnel of the present commission you will perceive that it has been so arranged that the work is practically under a military autocracy.

Col. Goethals is the absolute commander in the Canal Zone. All the tremendous power of military authority is vested in him. The rest of the commissioners are but his assistants. That is the way in which we have accomplished the efficiency. Until we got into that situation we had a rather disquieting and disagreeable state of affairs. We had a number of very able men there; we had commissions attempting to carry on the work in a civilian way, in which each man had his say, and one after another, very able, upright, and devoted men came back from the Isthmus without having accomplished success. It was not until the work was put into military hands and a military officer with the one-man power of control took hold of it that real success in that great undertaking began.

Mr. BOURNE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BOURNE. Does the Senator from New York think the same condition would exist after the completion of the Panama Canal that existed during the progress of the construction?

Mr. ROOT. Not the same, but equally requiring the highest degree of efficiency. No one would think, sir, of putting a great railroad in charge of three men of equal authority. You put a railroad in the hands of a general manager, and under him are the general superintendent, the master of transportation, the chief engineer, and so on.

Mr. BOURNE. The practical management of the railroad may be put in the charge of the manager, but he is directed by the executive committee or the dominant influence of the executive committee.

Mr. ROOT. We here are the executive committee. We are the board of directors for this transportation company. The Congress of the United States, the committees having within their jurisdiction the affairs of the Panama Canal, and the President of the United States, with such authority as we vest in him, are always present to control the action of the man who has charge of the actual executive work, and if we are going to have efficiency we must put it in the hands of one man.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from New York refers to the head of the organization now as military in its character. I should like to ask the Senator whether he believes in making it military, with a military officer at its head?

Mr. ROOT. I do, sir.

Mr. WORKS. Then, why not be frank about it and so provide in the bill, that there may be no misunderstanding with respect to it?

Mr. ROOT. I do not think it is very material whether we do or not. I think it should be put in the hands of one man, and I shall advise, as I urged in the very beginning of the enterprise, that that one man shall be an officer of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I think it a very important matter to determine that question. I think it is one that should be determined right here and not leave it to somebody else to determine that question, if that is the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I am quite willing to put it so. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President, I shall interrupt the Senator from New York but a moment. I concur with the Senator that we are in the nature of directors, but I think we have an absolute right to appoint such an executive committee practically to manage the operations of the canal as we see fit. We are not the executive committee; we are the directors; and the general direction, where practicable, should be under such rules and regulations as Congress may lay down, and not such as the commission may prescribe.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, what is called an executive committee is a body to exercise the authority of the board of directors when that board is not in session. That is not what is proposed in this amendment; what is proposed is a division of executive power. I beg Senators to consider that there ought to be nothing in that Canal Zone that does not contribute directly to the one great thing that is to be done—that is, the maintenance and operation of the canal. To that should contribute the sanitation; to that should contribute the business; to that should contribute the activity of all the people who live in that zone. We did not acquire the Canal Zone as territory for general purposes; we did not acquire it for the purpose of founding colonies or building cities or maintaining a population; we acquired it solely for the specific purpose of building and maintaining a canal; and no man, woman, or child should be allowed to be in that zone or to do anything there except for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should have been glad if the Senator from New York had analyzed the provisions of the House bill and the provisions of the Senate amendment, in order that he might have told us whether there is greater concentration in the House bill than in the Senate amendment. I ask him now this question: All that has been accomplished at Panama has been accomplished with a commission. Technically speaking, the present chairman of that commission, or president of the commission, has no greater authority than has any other member of the commission. If he has exercised more authority—and undoubtedly he has, and it has been a very good thing for this country that he has, in my judgment—it has been solely because he was a dominating intellect and was able through his personal power to impress his will upon his fellow commissioners.

In that connection I beg the Senator from New York to notice that in the House bill the President is authorized to appoint a governor of Panama and "such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, and protection of the canal."

No one of these officers is required to be an Army officer or to have any connection whatsoever with the military arm of the Government. On the contrary, in the Senate amendment the commissioners are three—there may be a dozen under the House provision—but there is an absolute requirement that one of these be from the corps of Army engineers; they may all be from the corps of Army engineers, but one of them must have had experience in sanitation in the Tropics.

Mr. ROOT. One of them must be a civilian.

Mr. CUMMINS. I meant that two of them must be Army engineers or officers, and one of them must be a civilian. Does not the Senator think that this is a far greater concentration of authority than we now have in the law and indeed a greater concentration and more effective organization than is provided in the House bill?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think it is quite probable that under the provision suggested by the Senate committee the President would create substantially the same kind of relation between the president of the commission and the other members of the commission as that which now exists. I think that is quite probable. I am inclined to think that the necessities of the occasion—the necessities of the work—would require that, as they have required it in the case of the old commission; but I think the House provision more clearly declares the will of Congress that that shall be done than does the Senate amendment. I think ultimately the same result will be accomplished in either event, for, Mr. President, that work is to be done in the eyes of all the world. We have got to be efficient there or be humiliated. Whatever provision we may make, it will be the duty of the President to see to it that there is a kind of government over the operations of the canal that will produce efficiency. I think the House provision more clearly indicates the will of Congress to have that done than does the Senate provision, although I think any President who was worth his salt would bring about practically the same result under both. That is my view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senate committee to the House bill was adopted by a majority of the committee. I was in the minority, and I desire to indorse everything that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has said in favor of the House provision. Referring to the inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], I will say that the bill as it passed the House provides that—

> Any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid may be persons in the military or civil service of the United States.

If there is one governor of the canal and of the Canal Zone, as I think there should be in the interest of efficiency, the President could, if he so desired, appoint an Army engineer as the governor of the canal and Canal Zone. Whether he would think it wise or best to do so, I do not know; but the responsibility would be upon him. I have no doubt that if an Army engineer were appointed to govern the zone and to operate the locks of the canal, the work would be just as efficiently done as it has been done during the process of construction by an Army engineer.

I agree with the Senator from New York that, so far as possible, the zone should be stripped of its population, except such as is necessary for the operation and protection of the canal and its works. I think that policy, if it be adopted, will not necessitate the government by any commission.

The suggestion that a sanitary officer will be required upon the Canal Zone, of course, is wise and is evident. There will always have to be a sanitary officer there; but it does not follow at all that because you must have a sanitary officer he must be a member of the commission to govern the Canal Zone and the canal. It seems to me that if the President is responsible, as he will be responsible in the appointment of these men, whether the number be one or three, he is the man the country will have to look to for the wise administration and the successful government of the canal and the Canal Zone. If he appoints a man who does not give good results, of course he can recall him and appoint another.

It may be said that he could do the same if he appointed three men for the work. Of course, that would be true; but I myself see no advantage in complicating matters by providing for a commission under which it might be possible, if two out of three men disagreed with the chairman of the board, that confusion and lack of authority or divided authority might result to the detriment of what I consider to be one of the most important works of the United States.

I hope the House provision will be reinstated in the bill. If that provision should be reinstated, I think there are a few amendments that should be made. They are, however, of a very minor character; but, in general, the House provision, so far as it provides for one governor of the zone instead of three, meets with my approval, and I intend to offer that amendment at the proper time.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the House provision it would be entirely within his authority, if the President were to appoint an Army officer or any other person and put him in charge of the sanitation of the district, to remove him wholly from the authority of the governor, would it not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I think the House provision contemplates the appointment of as many persons upon the work as the President may think necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that you are not securing here the work of one man. If you want one man to be in charge of this work and all its incidents, why do you not say that he shall have that power and that the President shall not be permitted to appoint another person who shall have complete authority in sanitation, and another person who shall have complete authority in civil matters? It occurs to me that the House provision is susceptible of all the confusion that could possibly inhere in a commission and a great deal of confusion that could not find its way into the work of a commission.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I suggest, referring to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut that he thought there should be some amendment of the House provision if that were reinstated, that the difficulty mentioned by the Senator from Iowa would be met if, in place of the words "such other persons," in line 15, there were substituted the words "such assistants as he may deem proper." That would leave no doubt of the subordination of the various persons engaged to the general manager of the transportation of the zone.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that would remove the objection I have just made. I, of course, do not want to have it understood that I am in favor of a single will upon the Canal Zone. If I had my way about it, I would have the commission to whom was given the maintenance and the operation of the canal absolute; I would have the sanitation and the civil procedure in the hands of the commission. I rather agree with the proposition that, so far as the mere maintenance and the operation of the canal are concerned, there ought to be no disagreeing minds on that subject; but when it comes to the preparation of the Canal Zone for human beings in the way of sanitation, when it comes to the administration of justice among the people who live there, whether through the courts or in any other way, when it comes to the establishment and maintenance of schools, I can see no reason whatsoever for putting that authority into the hands of the man who should be charged with the maintenance and operation of the canal as a mechanical proposition. The duties are very widely different. I think we will have many more than the number of people suggested by the Senator from Kansas. If we fulfill our hopes and pass through that canal eighteen or twenty million tons of freight every year, when we consider all the accessories that will be necessary to take care of the people who pass through there, all the ships which pass through there, and the business which will grow up around Colon and Panama and in the interior, I do not think that all that should be in charge of a military officer. I agree that an Army engineer, or at least such an Army engineer as is there now, is the fittest person in the world to manage and operate the canal itself; but there is no such necessary connection between that management and operation, as it seems to me, to render it desirable to repose the other powers exclusively in the hands of the man who puts the ships through the canal and who is responsible for the maintenance of it in order that it may be in readiness for the ships.

Mr. ROOT. Does not the Senator from Iowa think that there would immediately, or very soon, grow up conflict of jurisdiction? If you have one man managing the operation of the canal, the mere mechanical work of getting the ships through, another man looking after the sanitation, and another man governing and acting as the chief executive of the people who are collected there for the purpose of doing all sorts of things, in the nature of things the line between these different functions must be very undefined and doubtful, and you will immediately have conflicts of jurisdiction, quarrels, and controversies; we will have three men there getting cross-eyed looking at each other, each one afraid that the other is going to get some little more power and take power away from him, and you will have a miserable controversy there all the time, instead of having effective operation of this great work, to which everything ought to contribute. Everything ought to be made subordinate to the successful operation and the continued safety of that canal. The man who operates it has got to guard it. A half dozen sticks of dynamite will blow up one of these locks at any time.

Every activity of that zone should be made to contribute toward the safety, preservation, maintenance, and operation of the canal. Just as soon as you put in three other men, coequal in authority to take care of other things, you have the kind of controversy that destroys efficiency.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from New York did not entirely understand my suggestion. I believe if I had my own way I would put the sanitation and civil administration in the hands of the commission—these three—with equal power. The mere management and operation of the canal I would put in the hands of one man, because I think that work demands undivided power. But I take it from what the Senator from New York says that he does not believe there ought to be any courts down there.

Mr. ROOT. Oh, yes; I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that these people ought all to be judged by military law in order that there may not be any dissension whatever there, either among the commission or in any other governmental activity. We will have a lot of people there.

and we will have to take care of them according to civil procedure in some respects rather than wholly according to military procedure.

I wish to see the canal itself managed efficiently, and I have no doubt, even if the Senate provision were adopted, the man who is appointed chairman of the commission will exercise a dominating influence precisely as he does now.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I was one member of the committee who voted with the majority in adopting this amendment. I could not see then, nor am I able to see now, how that provision would interfere in any way with the efficient management of the Canal Zone operation, because if I could see so I would wish to recede from the position I took in the committee.

Now, we all know that practically it has been a one-man power down there, and that was the president of the commission, Col. Goethals, who had most efficient subordinates under him—for they were for all practical purposes subordinates.

The Senator from New York, while admitting that the commission as at present constituted has been practically dominated by the will of Col. Goethals, suggested that was due possibly to his strong personality and his ability to convince his brother members of the commission that he was the best qualified to dominate. That may be so. But I incline much more strongly to the opinion that every member of that commission, while recognizing the fact that greater efficiency, greater unanimity, greater harmony could be secured by paying attention to the wishes of the president of the commission, Col. Goethals, I think in addition to that knew that that was what they were expected to do by their creator, the President of the United States, and that any friction caused by them in undertaking to disregard his wishes would simply have resulted in their being relieved of their positions.

Now, in my opinion, an exactly similar condition will ensue, provided the canal is governed in accordance with the recommendations of a majority of the committee. I believe that the president of that commission, the Army engineer spoken of, will most certainly be Col. Goethals, if he is willing to accept the office. I believe that the sanitary officer provided for in the amendment will most certainly be Col. Gorgas, provided he is willing to accept the commission. The civilian is not so necessary, at least so far as concerns his personality, but I think is very important nevertheless concerning the question of a certain civil or quasi civil administration of the Canal Zone, because even admitting that there will be no one in that zone except the Army and Navy, and the members thereof, and the employees of the government and their families, there will still be a population which will not be less anyhow than 25,000. They have to be provided for in some way. They require schools, and there the work of a civilian comes in. Courts are required, and there the work of a civilian also comes in.

I am not one of those who believe that the zone should be thrown open to settlement. I never have thought, and do not now think, that there should be any occupants of that zone except those who are in the employ of the United States. But even admitting that, I do not see how this amendment can interfere in the slightest degree with the efficiency of the operation of the canal or of the Canal Zone in all of its operations, because it is more than simply the passing of ships through the canal; and in my opinion every necessary work can be subserved by the appointment of a commission such as this. For these reasons I favor the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senate provision in this section does not show entirely the House bill provision as I think it should be shown. I have taken the House provision, section 4, as to the governor of the Canal Zone, and have interpolated certain verbal suggestions made by the Secretary of War during the hearings, the effect of which is to make the governor not only governor of the Panama Canal, but of the Canal Zone, and to provide that it not only shall be completed and operated through the governor, but also the word "governed," and I have carried those suggestions through the section.

I will send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read section 4 of the House bill with the interlineations I have made, in order that it may go into the RECORD and in order that Senators may understand the complete system provided by the majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read section 4, as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senate has adopted amendments changing that language. Does the Senator from Connecticut seek to reconsider the amendment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not to reconsider. I assume that the few amendments which have been adopted—which would be proper provided the amendment recommended by the majority of the Senate committee were to be finally agreed to—will stand only in case the complete scheme provided by the Senate committee is adopted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And if those amendments which we have been making to-day, in the nature of perfecting the section, are all agreed to, as proposed by the majority of the Senate committee, then I shall offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the entire section. Thinking they would be in order in that shape——

Mr. BRISTOW. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Senate has adopted the amendments down to line 9, and they relate to an entirely different thing from what we are now discussing. That is a provision for perpetuating the present commission as it is until the canal is completed. The amendment we are now discussing proposes to formulate a government for the canal and the Canal Zone after the completion of the canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. What I mean is this: Whatever action we shall take upon section 4 in the Senate print of the bill, I propose to offer what I ask the Clerk to read as a substitute for this section, if it be in order.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator wants to get it before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to get it before the Senate, and if we do not vote on it to-night, I shall ask to have it printed, so that Senators may see it in print to-morrow.

Mr. BRISTOW. That will necessitate a reconsideration of the amendments we have already adopted or it would have to be offered in the Senate instead of in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it would necessitate a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut proposes, as the Chair understands, that after the section has been perfected he will move to strike it out and to substitute in place of it what he proposes to have read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be in order. The Secretary will read as directed.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be sufficiently advanced toward completion to render the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission unnecessary the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete, govern, and operate the Panama Canal and Canal Zone, or cause them to be completed, governed, and operated, through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, government, and protection of the canal and Canal Zone. Any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid may be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States; but the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified. He shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, government, and operation of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may, by law, regulate the same, but salaries or compensation fixed hereunder by the President shall in no instance exceed by more than 25 per cent the salary or compensation paid for the same or similar services to persons employed by the Government in continental United States. That upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have printed the section as proposed to be amended?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask that it may be printed; and of course if we vote on the section before we adjourn to-night the order may be vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order for printing will be entered, in the absence of objection.

Mr. BRISTOW. Referring to the remarks of the Senator from New York in regard to the construction of the canal, I would not take from Col. Goethals any of the honors that are due him, and they are many; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there has been no material change in the plan of constructing the canal since the order of the President requiring the commissioners to live upon the Isthmus and since he appointed as commissioners engineers who were required to be there and to attend to their official duties.

The troubles that attended the early days of canal construction were due to the fact that there was appointed a commission of engineers, as well as civilians, who did not go to the Isthmus at all and tried to construct a canal from Washington.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I did not wish to interrupt the Senator from Kansas, but to make an inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut about the amendment which he offered and which was ordered to be printed. Before it is printed, I want to call his attention to a feature of it which seems to me to be important, and if he concurs in that view the correction should be made before the amendment is printed.

I will inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether it is the intention by the amendment just proposed to give the governor of the Isthmus a right to hold the office of governor for four years without any power of removal. It seems to me, as I caught the reading of it, while all the other officers in the zone are subject to removal at the will and pleasure of the President, the governor is appointed for four years and there is no power of removal.

Mistakes, of course, are frequently made in the selection of agencies of that character, and it would seem to me very dangerous to have a governor appointed for a term of four years with no power of removal whatever. It seems to me there ought to be the same power of removal in the case of the governor as is given to the President in the case of other employees of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I supposed the President, after he had commissioned a person for a certain term of office, had authority to remove for cause. If he has not, I certainly would not have any objection to having that inserted.

I think the matter was discussed before our committee. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that at the top of page 5 the amendment suggested by the committee was that these commissioners, if we have commissioners instead of a governor, shall hold office until their successors are appointed and qualified, which would be quite as secure a tenure of office as the four years' commission of the governor, and that does not provide that they may be removed at any time by the President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. When a man is appointed to office for four years the constitutional provision that he shall hold office until his successor is appointed and qualified does not give the power of removal before the expiration of the term for which he was appointed. I do not say the President may not have that power, but I say it ought not to be left in doubt and make room for controversy in the courts. If it be the purpose of the Senator to give that power, the addition of a few words making it clear might save a great deal of trouble, and, in my judgment, they ought to be inserted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator entirely. I would suggest, after the language in the amendment which I send to the desk, which provides that a governor shall be appointed for four years, that it be provided that he shall be removable at the pleasure of the President. I simply called the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the language in the Senate committee amendment because that is open to the same criticism.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is open to the same criticism. I think it is best to avoid controversy in respect to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So do I. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I beg to differ with the Senator from Connecticut as to the indefiniteness of the Senate committee provision. When an officer is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to hold until his successor is appointed and qualified, there is not an officer in the Government who is so appointed who is not removable at the will of the President. The internal-revenue collectors in the various States are appointed under exactly the same provision, and the President can remove them whenever he wants to. It is an indefinite term.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not taking issue with the view expressed by the Senator from Kansas, but I say there might be room for some controversy in respect to the language and it had better be removed now than left to construction later.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest further that the language, "All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority removable at his pleasure," would seem to indicate a purpose to draw a distinction between the right of removal of the governor and other persons. If the Senator from Connecticut would, in that portion, provide that the governor and all other persons——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing, but I think it makes no difference whether the proviso as to the removal of the governor be separated from that of all other persons or included in it. It is immaterial to me.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I was saying before the interruption that the President appointed a commission and required them to live upon the Canal Zone and take an active part in the work of construction. Then the friction which existed prior to that time was eliminated. But the plan of construction that was formulated when Mr. Wallace was the engineer in charge has been practically carried out by the commission that has succeeded him. Mr. Wallace resigned, and he was succeeded by Mr. Stevens. Then there was one change made. A lock canal was determined on instead of the sea-level canal, which had been theretofore contemplated. With that exception, the present plan of construction has simply been the carrying out of that formulated during the régime of Mr. Wallace. There has been no friction other than that incident to all commissions of that kind.

Col. Gorgas has been in charge of sanitation from the beginning. He was sent to the Isthmus when we took control, and he is the one man on the commission whose services date from the beginning of the canal construction down to the present time. I do not know a man who has been connected with the canal construction who has contributed more to the success of that enterprise than he, and I make no exceptions. He has been in charge of the sanitation for 10 years, or almost that period. In the beginning of the construction of the canal there were more men engaged in making the necessary provision for the sanitation of the Isthmus than in construction work, and it was necessary. The attempted construction under the French had failed because of the insanitary condition that existed on the Isthmus and the diseases which prevailed there which swept off the French by the scores and the hundreds. It was through the wonderful sanitary provisions made that has resulted in the success of our enterprise there; and I am not willing that the Army engineer in charge of construction should be placed superior to or given greater praise than the Army medical officer who has been in charge of the sanitation of the Isthmus.

I am not willing to concede that the sanitation of that Isthmus after the canal is in operation is not just as important as the operation of the canal itself, because with carelessness in the sanitary arrangement there disease will come back. There has never been a month when the Canal Zone is not threatened with the same deadly diseases that were so fatal during the French occupation, and I think it would be unwise to substitute a new government in the place of the one we now have, which has worked so successfully.

The canal has been constructed by a commission, not by one man, and just as great wisdom was exercised by the President of the United States in selecting the subordinate commissioners, if they may be so termed, as in selecting the president of the commission himself.

Why is it necessary for us to take any chances by changing the form of government that has been so successful during the period of construction and institute a new one after the construction is completed, when the same conditions will exist that have been met, with the exception that it is to be an operation of the canal instead of a construction of it?

As to the population, there will be a large population on the Isthmus, whether the United States Government retains in its possession every foot of land in the zone or not. I am not disposed to object to the provision of the bill which authorizes the President of the United States to acquire all of the land which we now do not own, and hold it as land belonging to the United States. I believe that possibly is a wise provision, but there will be a large population there.

I talked with a young man but a few days ago who was engaged by a commercial company to represent them in Central and South America on the western coast. He is going to live at Panama, on the Pacific side. He will live at Balboa, on American soil, within the authority of the American Government. There will be hundreds and hundreds of others, unless we intend to bar business men from having representatives live upon the Isthmus, where they can come in convenient contact with their customers in the Central and South American States, which I think would be preposterous, and no one would contend that we should do it.

Now, should an Army officer be in absolute authority as the governor of the zone over the sanitation and the civil administration of affairs where there are thousands and tens of thousands of people living? I think not. Nor do I believe that a civilian who might be appointed governor of the Canal Zone by the President should have charge of the operation of the canal, because that is a professional and technical business. I think one of the Army engineers should be assigned to that duty.

These three men will be the advisers of the President. If it is feared that there will be friction in a commission, we can by law fix the responsibility of each, but I have thought it wiser to leave that to the President. He can segregate and divide the responsibility of each and assign the duties of each, Congress providing that these three branches of the government shall be represented by these distinct heads.

I am sorry that I can not agree with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in the view that an arbitrary one-man government is better than a commission government of three. Of course, it has been said that a beneficent despotism is the best government. That may be, but we are not proceeding in this age of civil government along that line.

When we organize a government for the District of Columbia we do not appoint a mayor who will have absolute authority. We have three commissioners, each with his responsibilities. They doubtless have differences of opinion, but each man has his work to do. When a city organizes its commission instead of its council it assigns to each commissioner his duties, and he is held responsible for the administration of those duties.

This provision in the Senate committee amendment is simply in harmony with the modern idea of commission government.

For one, I am not willing that all civil authority shall be subordinate to military authority. I do not believe it would be wise for a President to have solely as his adviser one governor, who is a military officer, and I think it would be very unwise for the supreme authority there over canal operation to be placed in the hands of a civilian. It is as necessary to have the three branches of government there as it can be anywhere. Whatever the decision of the Senate is as to the provisions of this law, I am confident that in its final operation the very necessities of the case will demand that three men be placed in charge of these three divisions. I think the Congress ought to take such position and perpetuate the system which has been so successful up to the present time, and in this reorganization simply eliminate the officers who will no longer be needed after the construction is completed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course it is not proposed to give this governor of the Canal Zone supreme authority over everything. There always have been courts on the Canal Zone, and the bill contains a clause providing for a reformation and readjustment of the judicial system upon the Isthmus. The bill does not compel the appointment of a military officer. It provides for the appointment of an engineer of the Canal Zone, and the President may, if he prefers, appoint a military officer. I do not see anything oppressive about that.

The fact is that those who have had the administration of large affairs far from home, such as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] when he was Secretary of War, the present Secretary of War, the President, who has been Secretary of War, and Col. Goethals himself, all advocate the House provision of the bill, and they were much disturbed at the amendment proposed by the majority of the Senate committee. Col. Goethals in his testimony, taken on the Canal Zone before our committee, said, on page 11 of the book:

> The form of organization I think we ought to adopt is one by which an officer of the Corps of Engineers should be at the head.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. You mean as director?
> Col. GOETHALS. As superintendent, or anything you please—the same position as I occupy. He is educated by the Government; is sent down here on a detail, and would be a continuation of the service of canal operation our officers are doing all over the United States. His pay should be a certain fixed percentage over and above his pay received as an officer of the Army of the United States. His assistant should be an officer of the United States Army. I also think civil engineers of the Navy would be fitted for either position. I believe that on his staff should be a doctor from the Army, to have charge of the sanitation of the Canal Zone, reporting directly to him. I believe that the quarantine should be under the Marine-Hospital Service, also Government officials. I believe the hospitals for the health of the employees should be under a doctor of the Army or Navy, as these men are specially trained for that service.

Of course I have never had any experience in administration of this kind. The Senators and the men in public station I have named have had, and I am free to confess, even if my judgment did not agree with theirs, I would be inclined to defer to them. It seems to me perfectly patent that this is the wise thing to do, at least to start the operation of the canal that way, and if upon trial we should want to change the law or to have a commission we could do it at any time. The House of Representatives have thought that way, and the House committee and the officials of the Government in charge of this work think that way.

I sincerely hope that when it comes to a vote the Senate will substitute the amendment I have sent to the desk in place of that recommended by the Senate committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was one of the Members of the committee who voted against the amendment adopted by the committee. I believed then, as I do now, that the principal business we have is the construction first, and then the operation of the canal. I think some Senators and others have magnified the government of that zone until it becomes greater than the canal itself. From some talk that I have heard here and that we hear everywhere it would seem that one of the desires is to take care of some of the gentlemen who have contributed very largely to the construction and the completion of that work.

So far as I am concerned, while I have the greatest respect for all the commissioners, and I believe that some of them, at least those who are necessary, will be retained under any form of government which we may adopt, if they wish to remain, yet I think now that the canal is completed, or at least we are contemplating its completion by this legislation, it is of the utmost importance that the highest efficiency possible should be secured. I submit, Mr. President, that it is my opinion that if there were not in mind several distinguished gentlemen who have worked on that plan and the proposition was up to us unembarrassed or uninfluenced by any consideration of those other gentlemen, there would not be a large minority voting for this proposition. It seems to me that inasmuch as we have carried the work on during the last few years at least practically under one man, although we have had a commission, as the Senator from Iowa, I think, said, under this arrangement the chairman would probably dominate the commission; he would exercise a dominating and controlling influence over those three men. Why not hold him responsible, and him alone, so that there shall be no chance to evade responsibility on the ground offered by the other gentlemen that one man was superior to them in the influence which he could exert? If we place it under the charge of one man we will know to whom we can look in case of failure in any particular.

No man is going to be placed at the head of that commission who does not look after its sanitation, and look after it as well as it is now looked after; no man is going to be at the head of that canal as the governor of the zone who does not look after the civil government, limited as it ought to be down there. It is a great big enterprise, but the territory covered is small. It is not a republic; it is a zone 10 miles wide and forty odd miles long. One man placed in charge, or at least having the responsibility placed upon him, it seems to me, would make for economy; it would make for efficiency. The success of that canal is the thing that we are all working for, as it seems to me, and if we could start it out under some such responsible head, it occurs to me that we could make any changes that experience would demonstrate to be necessary after the canal is completed.

I say this in order to explain the reason I had for voting for the House provision, having in mind all the time, as was suggested in the committee, that the House provision would need some perfecting in order to meet the clearly expressed object of that provision itself.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I myself have had very serious doubt as to the propriety of undertaking to establish any permanent commission of three members to have charge of the canal after its completion. The condition of things upon the Canal Zone is unique and interesting. I presume nothing just like it can be found anywhere else upon the earth. Perfect discipline is maintained, laws are enforced, educational facilities are furnished, and the statutory law upon which all of it is based and goes on is very scant indeed. It practically all rests upon Executive order. A system of civil law is in force, a civil code and a criminal code exist, not by virtue of any specific enactment by the Congress but as a result of Executive order. The most perfect organization has been developed that can be found anywhere in this world. That organization has been the result of an adaptability of men for the particular places which they fill.

I discovered, as I think other visitors did, soon after we arrived on the Isthmus in a trip down there, that underneath the smooth running of this organization there was a certain amount of suppressed jealousy, if you might call it that; but, because of the fact that the men in charge felt their responsibility and were trained men of a military caste, those jealousies were kept in the background and the work was allowed to proceed without friction in any way becoming dangerous to its progress. I think no visitor could be there more than 24 hours without discovering that, no matter what the formal name of the organization might be, one man was in fact in charge of it, and that the will of that one man controlled its movements. I believe that had the men in charge there been civilians who had not been trained and disciplined as the skilled Army officers there are, this suppressed jealousy, that did not become strong enough to obstruct the smooth running of things down there, would have done so and a great deal of trouble would have followed.

As has been said, we are not in possession of the Canal Zone for the purpose of opening up homesteads and establishing commercial communities. We acquired it for the purpose of building and operating a canal, and should we ever abandon the operation of a canal our right of sovereignty in the territory would cease. The whole thing rests upon the fact that we are in possession there for the purpose of maintaining and operating the canal. I believe that Col. Goethals's advice is worthy of the most serious and profound consideration when he says that he would remove from the Canal Zone the natives who inhabit each side of it along the canal, take their little holdings, pay them, put them off, and allow the canal strip, outside of the necessary towns, to grow up into a jungle because, in his opinion—and I am profoundly impressed by it—the safety of the canal itself will be promoted by just such a condition as that. If we are to permit a motley collection of irresponsible people of all colors, shapes, and sizes to live along the banks of the canal and within the Canal Zone, enemies of the United States, enemies of the canal, with a design to do it injury, they may find just the character of surroundings they are looking for if they should desire to lurk in the vicinity for the purpose of doing any harm.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a question, under present conditions, with a strip a few miles wide and jungles on each side, what is there now to prohibit an enemy from coming in and doing the damage to which the Senator refers?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not know that there is anything; but I am calling attention to the condition that Col. Goethals, in his testimony, advises us would be the best condition for the safety of the canal. It is that each side of the canal between Ancon and Colon be a jungle, with a strong fortification at each end, and the territory between the termini practically uninhabited. He advised that as the best course for the safety of the canal itself. If that condition should exist, we need only the most simple form of civil government in the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state to the Senator that the Senate committee concurred in that feature of the House bill, that the United States Government should acquire the land on each side of the canal, and no provision is made for its sale, so that the question as to whether or not the natives should be permitted to live there, so far as Congress is concerned, has been left with the President. The question involved in this amendment is what shall be the nature of the government for the people who must live there in the towns which we are establishing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly; that is what I am going to discuss.

Mr. President, if that view meets the approval of Congress, and the jungle is allowed to grow up on each side of the canal between the termini, there will be no large population anywhere within the zone, except in the communities at each end of the canal, Colon and Panama, which, of course, are under the general control of the Panama Republic, and perhaps at Christobal and Ancon, which will be within the zone. We will, of course, have certain sanitary regulations and police regulations over Colon and Panama, but they are within the Panaman jurisdiction, as all other towns will be with the two exceptions I have named.

When the 25,000 employees who are now engaged there have finished their work, on the completion of the canal, they will vanish; the American engineer, the American workman will come back to the United States; the Spanish laborers will go home; the negro laborers from the adjacent islands will go back to Jamaica, or wherever they came from, and those who remain will go into the jungle outside of the Canal Zone, so that the present population of laboring men now there will have disappeared in a short time. When the population of the Canal Zone will be largely confined to the cities at each end of the canal and the intervening territory is allowed to grow up in a jungle, why will we need a division of responsibility there?

Even under the provisions the Senate has recommended it is going to be a one-man government in this—that it will be in the hands of the President of the United States to appoint and remove at pleasure. He can appoint the governor and remove him at pleasure, and he can appoint the other officers and remove them at pleasure. It will be a one-man government, and necessarily so, under the circumstances, as it is now a one-man government, but it will not run so smoothly as the present one-man government if you undertake to establish three heads to it and have questions of power and jurisdiction arising between these individuals.

Members of the Senate should remember that that isthmus lies a couple of thousand miles away from the Capital of the United States; the people there can not appeal to Congress and get relief for the little grievances and disturbances that are bound to come up every once in a while, and the simpler the form of government and the higher the degree of efficiency for the purpose for which it is established the better it will be.

I notice in section 7, with reference to the rights of individuals, their protection in civil and in criminal courts, as has existed heretofore under the law, there will be a provision for the appointment of magistrates; their jurisdiction will be clearly defined; they can try civil causes; they can try criminal causes, and the right of appeal will lie in cases of certain importance to the courts of the United States; so that under this system there is no chance for an arbitrary tyrant or czar to ride roughshod over those people in their property rights or personal liberty. But instead of having three heads, three coordinate branches in authority over a little strip of country 2,000 miles away, over which we are exercising control for one purpose only, namely, the operation of a canal—instead of dividing the governmental authority into three divisions I think the House provision is the better, and simplifies matters by providing one head who shall be given necessary and adequate assistance. No one for a moment will think that by putting a governor there he will do away with sanitation; that he will neglect to employ a competent physician or health officer and put him in charge of the sanitation of the Canal Zone. It is certainly hardly a fair presumption to assume that one man placed in that responsible position will neglect to make the appointment of magistrates to enforce the laws; but there will be a single head to the government. I think conditions in that country so far from home require single responsibility, and I believe that high efficiency will be better promoted by the principle of the House bill than by the division of power contemplated by the Senate amendment.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator before he takes his seat whether he supposes that the governor of the Canal Zone, who necessarily would have to be an engineer of high standing, and who would appoint the sanitary officer and the civilian, would undertake to interfere or to direct the operations of those officers? For instance, does he suppose for a moment that Col. Goethals now would undertake to suggest to Col. Gorgas the proper methods to be used for sanitation, knowing as he does that he is not qualified by his training to judge of such matters, while the sanitary officer in charge is so qualified; or does he suppose that Col. Goethals would undertake to make suggestions to the officer in charge of the civil administration as to how he should conduct that service, knowing perfectly well that he is not qualified by training for that any more than is Col. Gorgas; or that the present governor would undertake to make suggestions to Col. Goethals as to what to do in the present digging of the canal or in its operation after it was completed?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am sure I do not know how far these gentlemen might go in suggesting to each other the matters of detail in connection with the execution of their duties. But I do know——

Mr. THORNTON. I think it will go on just exactly as it is going on now. Col. Goethals is not undertaking to suggest to Col. Gorgas, the sanitary officer, what he should do, and the same thing would happen under the new government, assuming that the Senate acts favorably on the Senate committee amendment, and the same thing would go on in the future, just exactly as it has done in the past, and there would be no friction at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will say to the Senator, from what opportunity I had to make observations when I was there, I personally am inclined to believe that there is some ground for apprehension that there would be more or less friction in that form of government. Now, of course, after all these years practically all of these questions regarding details in administration, in sanitation, in discipline have been settled.

Col. Gorgas is entitled to the greatest credit and all the honors that can be bestowed upon him for what he has done, not only on the Isthmus but in Habana and elsewhere in Cuba. And yet the rules and methods he has applied to bring about these conditions are now well known; and I dare say if Col. Goethals should die to-morrow, and if Col. Gorgas should go to his long rest to-morrow, the organization they have established there, the men who have grown up under them there and executed their orders and know what the remedies and the system are, could carry on that work, and we would hardly know, so far as the future is concerned, that they had disappeared. It seems to me from this time on, or after the canal is completed, the question is one of simplicity and effectiveness, and personally I believe that both would be promoted by having the matter in one man's hands.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the idea expressed by the Senator from South Dakota that there should be a one-man head. We must have, in order to have good government, one executive and not three. It is true that whoever may have that place would have to depend for sanitation, for instance, upon those who understand it, and he would be able to command the assistance that he might wish; the same as to other branches of the work.

We do not have three Presidents of the United States; we have one President and his corps of assistants, known as the Cabinet. We do not have three or four commander generals of the Army of equal rank; and I do not believe any business can be carried on in a businesslike way, economically and forcefully and up to date, unless we have an executive head.

It is true that with a board of three or a board of more one man may be chairman, but in the visits I have made to the canal and in the reports I have had from time to time—and I have given them considerable attention—there have been times when there were very broad differences and a great deal of friction. It has been eliminated, more or less, but at the same time there have been some burning spots all the way through.

The canal is a military affair; a military asset. I listened to Col. Goethals one evening—and he is as able in expressing his ideas as he is in digging the canal—and there were present 140 members of the American Engineers' Society. The question whether the canal would pay came up—the question as to its commercial value—and he was frank enough to put it at once: "It is a military asset. While it is a measure of commercial value, its main and intrinsic value is the protection of the United States." And when the matter of battleships arose the question was put to him, "If $400,000,000 is necessary to build the canal, why not spend it in battleships?" and he remarked at once, "A battleship costs $10,000,000, and in five years it is on the scrap pile. We want battleships, but we want this canal through which to transport them from ocean to ocean, so we can quickly meet a foe approaching us from either east or west."

We want a government at the Canal Zone in the nature of a military government. We want it strong. We want it focused in one head. We want the assistants, whether commissioners or others, if put there for specific purposes, to report to the one head. It may be very necessary to have a good cashier or a very good bookkeeper, but it is not necessary that he should have equal rank with the president of a bank or any other business concern. It is indispensable from my point of view that we have one head with the proper assistants.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee how he construes the language between lines 6 and 8:

> Any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act may be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States.

Does that mean that the President, in his appointments, shall be confined to the Army, Navy, and civil service of the United States?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It never would have occurred to me that it meant that, and I should be opposed to it if I thought it did mean that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think it means that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No. I think it means that the people down there, the officials on the canal, may be appointed from the Army or the Navy on a detail, and if they are, the amount of their official salary there shall be deducted from that which is paid them as their regular Army and Navy salaries.

Mr. OVERMAN. It looks to me like it provided for the appointment—I did not read all of it; my eye happened to glance at the words "persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They may be; that is, that officers of the Army and Navy and persons in the civil service should not be excluded. That would be my interpretation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why should they be mentioned? The very fact that you mention them might be construed to mean that otherwise they would be excluded. If you said nothing about them, they could appoint whom they pleased, but having mentioned them from the Army and the Navy and the civil service there is danger of that interpretation. I think the words should be "civil life," instead of "civil service."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Perhaps the word "service" should be changed to "life."

Mr. OVERMAN. You can have "civil service," too, but add "from civil life," so as to read "from civil life or the civil service of the United States."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing that the Senator should make that amendment. It never occurred to me. That was the language in the House bill, and it did not occur to anybody in the committee that it was anything but permissive; that is, that the Army and the Navy should not be excluded. I am perfecly willing to have it read "from the Army or Navy or civil service or from civil life," if the Senator will suggest that as an amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I think the paragraph is in a degree susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the Senator from North Carolina. A very simple amendment would make it clear, so as to read:

> If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act shall be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States—
>
> Strike out the word "but"—
> the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall, etc.

It is perfectly clear why this provision was inserted here. It was to adjust the salaries of persons chosen from the military naval, or civil service of the United States; but in view of the fact that "may" is so often interpreted "must" or "shall," the provision as it is now creates a certain degree of ambiguity.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina is prudential, and I think the remedy proposed by the Senator from Ohio is a perfect one. I therefore suggest that the Secretary at the desk, in line 13, before the word "any," on page 4, insert the word "if," and, in line 15, strike out "but."

Mr. BURTON. One other correction is necessary. In line 7, instead of the word "may" insert "shall be," so as to read "shall be persons in the military, naval," and so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was reading from the House print and therefore my reference to the page is not correct. I will ask the Secretary to state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 6, before the word "any," insert "if," beginning the word "any" with a small "a"; in line 7 change the word "may" to "shall"; and, in line 9, strike out the word "but"; so as to read:

> If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act shall be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted, etc.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand the application of that part of the bill to the civil service. Is it possible that a person could be appointed from the civil service to a position created by this act and still continue to receive the salary which he formerly received under the civil service and under a former appointment? There is no provision of law for any such transfer. If he is appointed to a position under this act, he at once, of course, abandons his position in the civil service.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, I do not suppose that if anybody is appointed from the civil service here his salary as such official in the civil service would go on and he would get another salary down there.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be that the provision in the House bill which provides as to the amount of the official salary paid to any such person, when it alludes to the military and naval and civil services all together, is not a proper one.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that applies properly to the military or naval service, but it does not apply properly to the civil service.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator is correct about that.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest a possible explanation of that. If a person were transferred from the auditing department of the Treasury, as in the case of transfers made to Cuba, it would be temporary in its nature, but that is not what this bill means. This bill means an absolute transfer which would seem to involve the loss of his position in the civil service.

Mr. CUMMINS. It might not involve the loss of his position as a civil-service man or as a classified employee, but it would at once involve the loss of his former salary. It would terminate, and he would get whatever salary was given in his new position under this proposed act.

Mr. NELSON. In the phrase commencing with the word "any," in line 6 on page 5, I suggest that, before the word "any," the word "if" be inserted, so that it would read:

If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act may be persons in the military, naval, or civil service of the United States—

I think the wiser way would be to put in the word "or" between the words "military" and "naval" and strike out "civil service." It would then read:

If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act may be persons in the military or naval service of the United States—

The word "but" should be stricken out—the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation.

That makes it consistent and makes it read in a proper manner. I suggest that amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Strike out "or civil service of the United States."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I suggest that the word "may" should be changed to "shall."

Mr. NELSON. "May" is sometimes construed to be mandatory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Secretary, if he had it in mind so that he could report it, as I did not follow, please to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed changes.

The SECRETARY. So that it will read:

If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act shall be persons in the military or naval service of the United States, the amount of the official salary paid—

And so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that expresses the idea.

Mr. NELSON. That makes it clear. That covers the point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been suggested.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is an amendment pending, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. CUMMINS. And this is sort of superimposed upon it. I have no objection to this particular amendment, but I did not want it to be forgotten that we had an amendment pending.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] drew attention to this matter somewhat in advance.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Ohio will accept that amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not now in order. The pending amendment is one on page 4.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry here, and possibly to ask the consent of the Senate to the consideration of that amendment with the amendment proposed by the committee, from line 18, on page 4, to the end of the italics in line 6, page 5. They ought to be considered together, because they relate to the same subject, and it would not be intelligible to adopt one without also adopting the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that is the sentiment of the Senate, the Chair will put the amendment that way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that if the House provision should be restored in accordance with the amendment I sent to the desk, these words would be just as necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, but we ought to have an opportunity to perfect this amendment. I have an amendment to offer to the amendment proposed by the committee, and before the substitution is voted upon, which, I take it, would end the matter, I should like a chance to offer the amendment perfecting the amendment presented by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Senator has that right, but I understood the Chair to rule that this amendment is not now in order; that the pending amendment is the amendment on page 4.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I ask consent that that amendment—that is, the insertion of the words "as now constituted"—shall be considered in connection with the proposed amendment of the committee from line 18 on page 4 to line 6 on page 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is agreeable to the view of the Senate, the Chair will treat it as one amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. As one amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Beginning at line 9, to strike out the word "unnecessary" and insert the words "as now constituted," and then to strike out the succeeding seven or eight lines as marked in the bill and insert the words in italics between line 18 on page 4 and line 6 on page 5. The Chair will treat it as one amendment; and that being the case, the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present the followig amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On line 20, page 4, amend the part proposed to be inserted by the committee by inserting, after the word "reorganized," the words "and who shall have control of the maintenance and operation of the canal," so that it will read:

One chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized and who shall have control of the maintenance and operation of the canal, one experienced in the work of sanitation in the Tropics, and one civilian.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that the word "sole" be inserted before the word "control."

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to accept that modification. That is what I supposed the amendment I sent to the desk to mean. It emphasizes it and I am quite willing to accept it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I can reach no conclusion except that the House provision is better than the proposed Senate committee amendment. I say that with the utmost regard for the careful attention given to it by the Senate committee.

It seems to me in our discussion there has been some misapprehension of the meaning of the House provision. It does not mean that the governor shall be a dictator. He can not say that a man must go to prison. He is under well-defined restrictions. The bill most carefully provides for the creation of a district court, the incumbent of which shall be appointed by the President. It provides for the making of regulations by the President. It recognizes the fact that there is already a code of laws in force on the Isthmus. It clearly has in view the performance of executive functions alone. In the performance of those executive functions the management and operation of the canal would assume so great importance that he who has charge of that branch of the work is entitled to be governor of the zone. That looms so much that everything else must be subordinate to it.

I am inclined to think there is some degree not of vagueness but of insufficiency in the provisions on page 5 in the definition of the duties of other employees. It is, of course, intended that there should be some one in charge of sanitation, and there may be other duties to perform. It is for Congress to define the duties of each of these officials, although that duty is in the first instance imposed upon the President.

I am a very decided believer in the idea of a single executive instead of a triple-headed body. If the provision as given in the Senate committee amendment should be adopted it would not be in the power of the president of the commission to determine the control and operation of the canal. His action might be overruled at any time by the other two members of the commission. He could not choose the lock tenders; he could not determine the method of operation or the general management of the canal without the concurrence of the two other commissioners.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is asserting a principle to which I can not agree. Does he believe that in the government of our States there should be no secretary of state, no auditor of state, no superintendent of public instruction?

Mr. BURTON. By no means.

Mr. CUMMINS. All these are executive officers. Why not allow the governor to perform the functions of all these officers? The officer who is here described as a civilian is to have charge of the schools of the zone and the general civil welfare. That has really nothing whatever to do with either the maintenance or the operation of the canal.

Mr. BURTON. I have not succeeded in making myself clear. I certainly believe in other officers in the State, a secretary of state, a superintendent of instruction, and so on; but I do not believe in a collegiate body, such as this amendment would create, in which the secretary of state, the superintendent of instruction, or other State officials engage in deliberations with the governor and have just as much power as he has. Under such a plan we would have three commissioners, and in determining the management of the canal those two would have the power to overrule the ruling of the president himself.

Of course, the question of commission government has been very much discussed, and also the so-called federal plan in cities, which has been largely adopted, under which all responsibilities center in the mayor. We have the appointment of the director of public works, the director of safety, and director of law much after the form of the Cabinet of the President. The object of that is to center responsibility and control in one man, so that the people may know with whom they may find fault.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio is mistaken about the commission form of government, at least so far as it generally prevails in this country. The mayor has not the power to do these things. The commission itself determines as to which of its members shall have charge of this department or that department. At least that is the case in the city of Des Moines, which, I believe, was the first city in the country that adopted the so-called commission form of government.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Iowa misunderstood me. I stated that there were two forms of government—one the commission form of government and the other the so-called Federal plan. I described the Federal plan.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. BURTON. Under the commission form of government there are three. The main difference between the Federal plan and the commission form of government is that the latter does not include a legislative body. There is still a legislative body under the former, while the latter, the commission form of government, vests in the three commissioners the power vested in the legislative body as well as that ordinarily vested in an executive body.

There is a very wide difference between this Canal Zone, however, and the ordinary municipal government. The municipality is an organized public center. There is an electorate alert and awake to watch those who rule them and the press to criticize. Then, in addition to that, there are taxpayers whose rights are involved.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is not true of the District of Columbia, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BURTON. There is at least a press. There is a legislative body—that is, Congress—and there are the three commissioners. The District of Columbia does not have the modern type of commission government. It is of its own class. There is no other like it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume Congress is the legislative body of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BURTON. It is rather remote from the scene of action.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut. It is now 10 minutes after 6. I would be very glad if he would move to adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to do that, but before that is done the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] wishes to offer an order.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer an order. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Order, That the daily meetings of the Senate shall be at 10 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are to be night sessions?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is quite probable that this will tend to prevent them. I ask for a vote on the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the order just read.

The order was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may print in the RECORD a very illuminating editorial from the New York American of date of July 16, entitled "The Panama Canal; It is Ours, not England's."

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona if it is true that the proprietor of the American has repudiated an alleged interview? Is that the interview?

Mr. ASHURST. No; this is an editorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall not object, but I will say to the Senator that I have a wastebasket upstairs filled with editorials from all the papers of the country on various sides, and I am not going to ask to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ASHURST. If the distinguished Senator from Connecticut had read this editorial he would not have thrown it in the wastebasket; he would have preserved it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall not object to the Senator's request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Arizona was speaking and desired to insert it as a part of his remarks or to read it to the Senate, I should not object; but if we begin the business of just permitting editorials independently of speeches to be inserted in the RECORD, I do not see much end to it. I shall object.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will not embarrass the Senator by insisting that it be printed. I will withdraw it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can bring it in afterwards—some time in the course of a speech, or something of that sort.

Mr. ASHURST. I withdraw the request. I will not offer anything that might be objectionable under the rules or to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at the close of the routine morning business to-morrow I desire to address the Senate on the Panama Canal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will be entered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to state that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] I will submit some remarks to-morrow on the Panama Canal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice will be entered.

SCHOOL LANDS IN ARIZONA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7163) authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, which was, on page 2, line 3, after "act," to insert: "Provided further, That no more than 2,000 acres of such lands shall be selected under the provisions of this act."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator remember how many acres are in that reservation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Some six or seven thousand, in my judgment, and the amendment limits it to 2,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Why was it limited to 2,000 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Because the gentlemen in the other House simply put it as an abstract matter, without any reason that I could see, and insisted on it. They would not consent to the passage of the bill unless that limit was made. The Secretary of the Interior had recommended a larger quantity.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Interior recommended that all be selected?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know; but this was the only way of getting it through.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator feels that he is justified in accepting that limitation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir; it is all I could do.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 6, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 5, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer was offered by Rev. William Couden, of Norwalk, Ohio, as follows:

Thus far, dear Lord, Thou hast led us on. And after the sweet day of rest Thou gavest, we face the opportunities and duties of a new week. We thank Thee for all Thou hast done for us and bestowed upon us. We confide in Thee, because Thou art more interested in us than we are in ourselves, and Thy wisdom is infinitely transcendent. Help us, therefore, in all our thoughts and affairs to keep close to Thee, to fulfill Thy perfect will in love to God and love to man. Hear and answer our prayer according to the depth of our needs, and the reach of our hopes, and the love of Jesus our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF JODOIN AGAINST HIGGINS.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report in the case of Jodoin against Higgins from the Committee on Elections No. 3 be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the report of the Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of Jodoin against Higgins. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

[House Report 1136, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

RAYMOND J. JODOIN AGAINST EDWIN W. HIGGINS.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE, from the Committee on Elections No. 3, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 661):

The Committee on Elections No. 3, to whom was referred the contested-election case of Raymond J. Jodoin against Edwin W. Higgins, from the third congressional district of Connecticut, having duly considered the same, respectfully report:

After the contestee served his answer to the notice of contest, both parties and their several attorneys entered into a stipulation, dated March 16, 1911, in which, among other things, the following was stated:

"That in many voting districts it is probable that the moderators were mistaken in their decisions as to the validity or invalidity of ballots cast for said office of Representative in Congress from said district, and that without opening the boxes and examining the ballots therein it is impossible to determine the extent of such mistaken decisions.

* * * * * * *

"That it is impossible to tell with accuracy what ballots have been improperly counted or rejected for the contestant or contestee without opening said boxes and examining said ballots.

* * * * * * *

"That said contestant desires that said boxes be opened and said ballots examined and recounted and that the lawful and correct count of said ballots be ascertained thereby, without objection on the part of the contestee.

* * * * * * *

"That said contestant and contestee waive any question of formality or sufficiency of the pleadings as to said matter of contest and agree that all issues are properly raised and presented for the opening of said ballot boxes and for a recount of all the ballots cast at said election for the office of Representative in Congress for said congressional district in said Sixty-second Congress.

* * * * * * *

"That said contestant and contestee stipulate and agree to waive any and all claims which they or either of them might make under any of the pleadings or any part of the proceedings for the determination of said question, so that a full recount of all ballots cast for Member of Congress from said congressional district in said Sixty-second Congress may be had."

At the hearings before the committee counsel for the contestee in substance reiterated the willingness of the contestee that the ballots be recounted.

The evidence taken before the committee disclosed the fact that under the law of the State of Connecticut a recount of ballots could be had only if an application for such recount, founded on facts sufficient to justify the application, was made within three days after the election by an elector in the town in which the recount was desired. Under this law the elector in the town of Plainfield applied within three days after the election. The application was granted and the contestant (Jodoin) on such recount gained three votes in that town, thus reducing by that number the majority with which Higgins had been credited.

The third congressional district of Connecticut is composed of 36 towns. In no town other than that of Plainfield was an application for a recount made.

It was expressly conceded by the contestant and contestee—

"That said ballot as used in said election was novel to the voters of said district; that said ballot had never been used before at any election in said district for the election of a Representative in Congress to the United States, although a similar ballot had been used in most of the towns in said district at the preceding October election held for the election of town officers; and that there was a diversity of opinion amongst competent attorneys and judges as to the proper construction of the law as to said ballots and as to the effect of different marks and the location of the same upon said ballots and as to what ballots should be rejected for various causes."

A stipulation of parties to an election contest for a recount of ballots cast for Representative in Congress is not binding or conclusive either on the House of Representatives or its Committee on Elections. In view, however, of the stipulation to which we have above referred and of the declarations upon the hearings by the counsel for the contestee of his willingness that such recount should be had, and of the circumstances existing with regard to the counting of the vote in the town of Plainfield which reduced the meager majority by which the contestee was declared elected, and of the difficulty that the contestant would experience to secure a recount under the Connecticut law within the very brief period of time limited by the laws of that State, the committee concluded to give heed to the stipulation and render it effective by ordering a recount.

By direction of the House of Representatives, under the resolution passed March 21, 1912, the ballots were brought to the committee from Connecticut, where they had been securely kept. The boxes were opened in the presence of counsel and representatives of both parties and the recount was proceeded with, after the integrity of the ballots had been clearly established.

The fullest opportunity was afforded to the parties and their respective counsel to examine the ballots. A number of days were consumed in the examination, classification, and counting of the ballots, in which work counsel for the parties participated.

On May 17, 1912, at a meeting of the committee, counsel for both parties appeared and the counsel for the contestant, Jodoin, stated that after having made an examination of all the ballots he was convinced that the result would not be changed. The following colloquy took place at the close of the hearings:

"Mr. CARLIN. You represent the contestant?

"Mr. THAYER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. CARLIN. And you now admit that it is useless for the committee to expend any further time in the examination of these ballots, because the result would not be changed?

"Mr. THAYER. The result would not be changed. That being so, it is only a question of what the committee desires with regard to a report—whether it wants a report of the true state of the ballots, or a simple statement that an examination of the ballots, we believe, would leave the matter unchanged.

"Mr. CARLIN. Would the gentleman have any objection (of course, I do not know the feeling of the committee; I am just expressing my own idea) to entering into a stipulation that from an examination of the ballots counted you have both considered that the result could not be changed?

"Mr. THAYER. I would prefer not to, in view of my instructions from my client. I would prefer not to enter into such a stipulation, but in fairness to the committee I have to state that these disputed ballots, when classified as they are, would not change the result.

"The CHAIRMAN. And so you concede it would be useless for this committee to go ahead and look over the ballots?

"Mr. THAYER. Yes. It is only a question of whether, on the agreement as to classes, you want a report of the true result of the count, or simply a report that a recount would not change the result.

"Mr. CARLIN. Of course, the committee will take that up in executive session.

"The CHAIRMAN. I believe I express the sentiments of the committee when I say that we are thankful to you for the frankness with which you have treated the committee; and we appreciate the services of both counsel in this case. They have worked hard and have lessened the labors of the committee very much indeed. We are obliged to both counsel for the services they rendered in the matter.

"Mr. THAYER. I desire to thank the committee on behalf of my client, as well as personally, for the great courtesy we have received at the hands of the committee."

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Raymond J. Jodoin was not elected a Member of the Sixty-second Congress from the third congressional district of Connecticut and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That Edwin W. Higgins was elected a Member of the Sixty-second Congress from the third congressional district of Connecticut and is entitled to a seat therein."

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF GILL AGAINST CATLIN.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 2 to present the report of that committee in the contested-election case of Patrick Gill against Theron G. Catlin, from the eleventh congressional district of Missouri. (H. Res. 666, H. Rept. 1142.)

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to file a report in the case of Gill against Catlin.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the point of order, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman entitled to present a report unless he gets unanimous consent, to-day being Monday, unanimous consent, suspension, and committee discharge day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is asking unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to file the report in the contested-election case of Gill against Catlin. The Chair will pass on the point of order which the gentleman from Illinois has raised. The Chair does not think that anything is in order on unanimous consent, suspension, and committee discharge day except such things as will forward the business of the House.

Mr. MANN. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would couple with his request a request that the minority shall have five days in which to file their report.

Mr. HAMILL. That is satisfactory, provided the House does not adjourn before the five days have expired, because we want to consider this case.

The SPEAKER. There is not one chance in ten thousand that the House will adjourn within five days. That is not an official opinion, but a private opinion publicly expressed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I couple with my request the request that the minority may have five days in which to file minority views.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to file the report in the contested-election case of Gill against Catlin; and in connection with that he asks that the minority shall have five days in which to file views. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE TAYLOR SYSTEM.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Taylor system, or scientific method of shop management.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Taylor system of shop management. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WHITE OAK POINT BAND OF MISSISSIPPI INDIANS.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, on August 1 last I filed a brief which I had permission to print in the RECORD. That brief has been printed in the RECORD as if it was my speech, whereas it is by another party. I would like to make a short statement in the RECORD to correct that error.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to print a short statement in the RECORD to correct a mistake which attributes to him an article written by some one else. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, on page 10782 of the temporary RECORD of August 1 appears a statement that is not in the exact terms in which I presented it. From the way in which it appears it might be inferred that I adopted the brief set forth as my own, whereas it was not presented as such. The brief is an exhaustive one, carefully drawn by John G. Dudley, Esq., of the city of Washington, in behalf of the committee sent to Washington by the White Oak Point Band of Mississippi Chippewa Indians, of the State of Minnesota. The committee consisted of Mr. Charles A. Wakefield, Mr. Wahbasegay, and Mr. William H. Lyons, members of the band, and I submit the following as the articles of their authority:

To the honorable United States Congress, the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the honorable Secretary of the Interior:

At a certain general council of the Mississippi Chippewa Indians, composed of residents of the Chippewa Reservation, the so-called Minnesota National Forest, and the White Oak Point Indian Reservation, in the county of Cass, State of Minnesota, held pursuant to a notice given at a former council and recorded in the notes thereof according to the custom and usages of the tribe at Bena, Minn., on the 20th day of December, 1911, at which time and place the council was called to order. Mr. Odenegum was duly elected chairman, and Mr. William Losh was duly elected secretary, and Mr. Wahboze was called upon to state the object of the meeting, after which the following resolution was passed:

Now, therefore, we, the male members of the Chippewa Indian Tribe, being over 18 years of age and residents of the Chippewa Reservation, the so-called National Forest, and the White Oak Point Indian Reservation, in the county of Cass, in the State of Minnesota, hereby most urgently and respectfully petition the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, and the honorable United States Congress to concede to the following demands of the red man and give them in addition to what they already have the following land: To each Indian man, woman, and child 80 acres additional to the allotment which they already may have, and 160 acres to every man, woman, and child who has not as yet received an allotment, it being conditional that said men, women, and children be members of the above-named tribe and reside on or near to the territory aforesaid; giving them the right to hold their mineral rights whether on their individual allotments or on their tribal lands without respect to the location thereof, and giving them the further right to recover their allotment timber money in cases where the timber has been sold, cut, and removed without their consent; also in cases where the stumpage was taken and placed in the general fund; or, in other words, giving the Indians their just dues for the allotment timber.

The reasons for asking your consideration in these matters are plain and obvious, and we think that we are as much entitled to an 80-acre additional allotment, or 160 acres in all to each and every Chippewa Indian and woman and child, as are our brothers at the White Earth Indian Reservation in Minnesota, who have already received that amount at your hands; and we feel that in right and justice we are as much entitled to this additional grant as they are, who are our tribal brothers, the people with whom we are interested in tribal affairs. And we can not understand why we should have less than they if justice and right were taken into consideration.

We also most urgently and respectfully petition the honorable United States Congress to repeal Minnesota national forestry act, for the reason that it is contrary to the treaty under the Nelson Act of January 14, 1889, entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota." And in right and justice to the Indians it should not be fractured or amended in any way without first consulting those who were parties to the treaty, namely, the Indians. Further, the national forest lies in the midst of the Indian territory, and its location is a detriment to the tribe and is of no benefit to the public; and also the national forest, because of its inert condition, is retarding the development of the country lying in and about it, and in its dormant state it is a menace to civilization and it will be of great interest to us as well as to the general public to have this reserve thrown open to us and the incoming settlers, whether red or white. And, lastly, we do not feel that we are receiving our just dues by having this land taken from us without receiving pay for it, and the taking of land by the United States Government is without precedent. We do not understand why the United States Government, one of the most powerful and wealthiest nations under the sun, is desirous of acquiring land in this manner, being without comparison in the history of civilization.

The swamp lands which are now in controversy and pending settlement between the United States and the State of Minnesota we most urgently ask to have settled in favor of the United States Government and in the interests of the Indians, who, without doubt, own and are entitled to the lands in question.

We also pray that the United States Government pay over to us at once the proceeds from the sale of the Chippewa Indian timber. The reasons being that the Indians are in a greater want now than they ever have been and are suffering for the want of money, and many who are not able to work are on the verge of starvation, and, furthermore, those able to work would then be in a position to improve their allotments and make them suitable places in which to live, for since liquor has been refused us those hitherto unable to save their money are now making better use of it by providing for their families and improving their lands.

We most urgently, respectfully, and sincerely pray your consideration in the foregoing requests and know that after you have investigated you will have found the conditions to be as stated herein, and feel that you will then act in our behalf.

At the foregoing council it was decided that in order to be able to present this petition intelligently and in the proper manner before the department and Committees on Indian Affairs, that Mr. Charles A. Wakefield, Mr. Wahbasegay, and Mr. William H. Lyons be elected to act as delegates to proceed to the city of Washington and there to act in our behalf and to do everything possible to bring about the desired ends, and they were further empowered by the council herein, if need be, to employ an attorney to more clearly present and prosecute the above claims.

We furthermore ask the Secretary of the Interior and respectfully petition him to authorize and allow these delegates a reasonable compensation for their services, not to exceed $5 per day, while actually employed, and furthermore to pay their board while in Washington and their transportation, out of any money in the hands of the Government belonging to this tribe of Indians not otherwise appropriated.

The council herein do furthermore appoint Mr. Maushkahwahnahquot and Mr. Iahzhowegeshig to go before the United States Indian agent at Onigum, or before any judge of a court of record in the State of Minnesota, and have the foregoing petition certified to as being the minutes of the general council aforesaid, held at Bena, Minn., on the 20th day of September, 1911, in due form according to the tribal usages and customs.

We hereby certify that the above council was held at the time herein stated and that the foregoing are the minutes thereof.

ODE NE (his finger mark) GUM, Chairman.
WM. LOSH, Secretary.
J. F. BEEKER,
Proprietor Beeker House, Bena, Minn.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, County of Cass, ss:

I hereby certify that I believe the council mentioned in the foregoing minutes was duly held in accordance with the customs and usages of the Chippewa Tribe, and I recommend that the delegates therein named be given a hearing in such manner as may be deemed advisable.

J. F. GIEGOLDT, Superintendent.

The committee was very faithful in its work, spending several months in Washington in behalf of the band which sent them. They had Mr. Dudley assist them, and he drafted the brief. I would not want to take any part of the credit that belongs to him in the preparation of the brief, nor was it my purpose to adopt his argument. I have presented it because the brief was carefully prepared and the references verified so that it will serve the House in future as a reference brief.

The brief is not intended to support the bill to which it refers so much as it is to call attention to the justice and right of the claim of these Indians to relief. The bill was introduced in order to give them a hearing, and following its introduction a resolution was introduced, being House resolution 564, to secure the appointment of a committee of three from the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate the property rights of these Indians. I am promised consideration of this resolution early in the session beginning in December next. The purpose is to get at the real facts. That can not be done without sending a committee onto the grounds. There are many bills now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs that can not receive proper consideration till this investigation is made. This little band of Indians have been grossly wronged, and, so far as it is possible and reasonable, they should be placed in a position of independence. They parted with their property and have received little in return except broken promises. The mere fact that we have the power to keep them from securing their rights is not a justification for doing so. It is fair to give them and all others in that territory a fair hearing, after which proper remedies may be provided.

TOLLS THROUGH THE SUEZ CANAL.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it has been repeatedly both asserted and denied on the floor of the House that foreign countries paid tolls for their ships passing through the Suez Canal. The Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, has furnished me with a copy of a contract entered into by the French Government with the largest steamship company under the French flag, about 10 days ago. The Government agrees not only to pay the company a subsidy, but to pay the tolls for going through the Suez Canal in addition. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of tolls through the Suez Canal, is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the matter referred to:

TRANSLATION.

Following is translation of article 3 and marked part of article 96 (balance of 96 covers mode of paying subvention):

"ART. 3. The tolls based on tonnage for transit through the Suez Canal paid by the company on its subsidized ships shall be reimbursed to the company in addition to the subsidy according to the provisions of article 96 of the schedule of charges and obligations: Provided, That during the temporary period covered by that schedule the expenses of passing through the Suez Canal of ships on the route to Haiphong shall be paid by the company."

"ART. 96" (first paragraph relates to the subsidy). "The amount of reimbursement of the special navigation toll on tonnage through the Suez Canal is payable monthly at the end of the month at the same time as the subvention according to the estimates of expenses based on the figures for the previous year with the reservation of adjustment of balances at the end of the business year based on tolls actually paid." (Third paragraph relates to general subsidy.)

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. AUSTIN, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. JACOWAY, for two days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

PATENTS TO SEMINOLE ALLOTTEES.

The SPEAKER. This is Unanimous Consent Calendar day, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23184) directing the Secretary of the Interior to deliver patents to Seminole allottees, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to pass without prejudice this bill until Mr. CARTER, of Oklahoma, can be present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman if the report has been obtained from the department which was spoken of last week?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not know. The bill is the bill of the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does it appraise any land the patents of which are in suit or have not been issued?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It especially exempts them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill does not exempt them. Does it include patents of land which have been held up?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It can not, because it only pertains to lands where the title is clear where they can issue the patents. It is only because they have not been delivered that complaint is made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to the effect of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. The request of the gentleman was that it be passed without prejudice. The gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. CARTER, is not prepared to take up the bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. DAVENPORT, is not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to pass the bill without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1309) to establish a council of national defense.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. I object.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] introduced this bill and is in charge of it, and is not now in the Chamber. I have been asked to ask that it be passed without prejudice, and I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not object.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been passed before on the ground that the gentleman from Alabama was absent. I would like to ask, if the bill is passed without prejudice, if it can be called up again to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that it could.

Mr. HAY. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] objects to the consideration of the bill.

FORT GRANT MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 7163) authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this bill was read on the last unanimous-consent day. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] whether, if consent is given for the consideration of the bill, he would be willing to agree to an amendment to add at the end of the bill the words:

Provided further, That no more than 2,000 acres of such lands shall be selected under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I will accept such an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the agreement between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Arizona, I should like to know the object of that limitation. What is the purpose of limiting it to 2,000 acres?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, there are 12,000 acres in this tract, and it is the desire of the gentleman to permit the State of Arizona to select a farm site, a reform-school site, upon this land. It seems to me from what I have heard that 2,000 acres is quite ample for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Arizona prepared to state whether the limitation suggested of 2,000 acres would furnish adequate area for the purposes for which the land is desired?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think it would be enough for the present needs of the State industrial school.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the gentleman is satisfied with the amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; I have agreed to such an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall make no objection, then.

Mr. MANN. And I understand that the Senator from Arizona has also agreed to the amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I suppose it is the purpose of the State of Arizona to take not merely the land in the reservation, but the post itself—the buildings and things of that kind.

Mr. HAYDEN. The most valuable part of the reservation is located near the old Army post, where it is possible to irrigate a considerable area of land. The State of Arizona desires to obtain this irrigable land as a farm for the State industrial school. I do not know whether the State will be able to use the old buildings or not. We will probably have to construct new buildings.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The State would certainly be able to make use of the buildings there.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; for what they are worth. They are very old, and are built of adobe.

Mr. SLAYDEN. An adobe building is not necessarily very old when it is but 50 years old.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Secretary of the Interior, in reporting upon the matter, stated that there are a number of buildings on the reservation, but that they are mostly of adobe, and not believed to be of great value.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My purpose in asking the question is to emphasize a point I raised the other day. I have not the slightest objection to the concession of this land to the State of Arizona for the purpose for which it is wanted, but the action of the House is in marked contrast to its attitude in respect to the effort by the State of Texas to purchase land for the erection of a tuberculosis sanatorium, where we not only have to take care of the unfortunate consumptives of our own State, but have loaded on to the State every year from other States in the Union a large number of them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman whether the bill to which he refers, relating to Texas, has been reported by any committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It has.

Mr. ROBINSON. By what committee?

Mr. SLAYDEN. By the Committee on Military Affairs, but it is now in another bill in the Senate. I do not object to this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the agreement suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the bill was reported last week, and I think we can dispense with the reading of it now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all lands, together with the improvements thereon, within that part of the former Fort Grant Military Reservation, in the State of Arizona, situate and being outside the boundaries of the Crook National Forest, be, and the same hereby are, made subject to selection by the State of Arizona in partial satisfaction of the grant of 100,000 acres made to it for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions by section 25 of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 557): Provided, That such selection shall be made within three years from the date of approval of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, at the end of line 4, by adding the proviso:
"Provided further, That no more than 2,000 acres of such lands shall be selected under the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 21952. An act for the relief of James S. Baer.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpœnaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. on the 3d day of December, 1912.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 18642. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provile revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 15509. An act to authorize the construction of a sewer pipe upon and across the Fort Rodman Military Reservation, at New Bedford, Mass.; and

H. R. 24550. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from Montana an amendment which he expects to offer to the bill?

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have no amendment, but from what happened during the consideration of the bill when it appeared on the calendar before I should judge that probably Uncle Sam, speaking through the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], is not willing to make an outright gift of this property to the county of Hill. Fort Assinniboine was abandoned last November for military purposes, and the buildings and land, embracing an area of 343 square miles, were turned over to the Interior Department by the Secretary of War. Last February the county of Hill was created. A part of the reservation lies within the boundaries of this new county. The buildings at the post are 6 or 7 miles from the city of Havre, which is now the county seat of Hill County. The city had very poor facilities for taking care of persons held under the city government or awaiting preliminary hearings. Havre has made wonderful progress in other respects during the past few years. They have always needed a good jail building there, and now that the city has become the county seat of the new county of Hill, it is imperative that a new building and fixtures be provided at once. The county commissioners and city authorities have decided that they can afford to take down the brick jail at the post and remove it to Havre. It will no doubt be an expensive undertaking, but they are willing to do it if Congress will grant authority. The jail can be of no further use to the Government, and will deteriorate and fall to ruin if it remains where it is. We have a number of precedents for this legislation, and I regret that there should have been objection raised by anybody.

I had a conversation with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a short time ago in reference to an amendment providing a consideration for the building on account of previous objection to the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the amendment suggested?

Mr. PRAY. A nominal consideration. It is impossible for me to say how much the county commissioners of this newly created county would be willing to give. I should certainly not feel authorized to suggest anything more than a nominal sum. Of course, the gentleman understands that I do not believe the county ought to be obliged to pay anything. If I should consent to a payment in any sum, it would be done simply to avoid an objection to the present consideration of the measure. The bill has already been stricken from the calendar once, and if the same thing should happen again there would probably be no further opportunity to consider it this session of Congress. If the bill should have to go over to the next session, it would then be too late to be of any benefit to Hill County. If this attempt should fail, the commissioners will then have to make other provisions for a jail.

Now, I will say this to the gentleman, at the time the bill was under consideration before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], speaking from his personal experience in business, made the statement that the county commissioners could not afford to tear down this building and move the bricks and fixtures 7 miles, that it would not pay them to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will permit me, this same matter was discussed by the Committee on the Public Lands and given consideration there, and I believe I myself raised that question.

Mr. PRAY. The gentleman did.

Mr. ROBINSON. And after full consideration of it the committee reached the conclusion that the best manner of disposing of the matter was under the terms of the bill, that if you should require the appraisement of the building, and fix the value and methed of sale, and so forth, that it might prevent the sale of the jail building, which is not found of any considerable value to the Government under existing conditions, whether the appraisement was directed by the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Interior, or somebody else. From the fact that the property is abandoned by the Government and it is not used and can not serve any useful purpose as far as the Government is concerned, and from the fact that it would be expensive to remove the building, the committee reached the conclusion it was not wise to put that in the bill. For my part, if the gentleman from Montana wishes to agree to some amendment, I shall raise no objection to his offering the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire, so far as I am concerned, to have its appraised value for the purpose of removing it, but I have no desire to transfer the title of the property without any consideration and, as a matter of fact, as a precedent. I am perfectly willing, as far as I am personally concerned, to accept a nominal consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON. The citizens of Hill County need a jail. That is evidently true or the gentleman from Montana would not have introduced this bill. It seems to me the precedent would be rather a good one than a bad one.

A MEMBER. Make the consideration love and affection.

Mr. MANN. That is what they want to do; make it love and affection. I do not care what the amount is, but I am not in favor of a precedent being established of giving property without any consideration at all. I thought the gentleman would have had an amendment prepared.

Mr. PRAY. I do not think it requires any time to prepare an amendment. In view of the gentleman's statement, I would suggest that an amendment carry the consideration of $10, and I will offer such an amendment at the proper time. I think that would meet the gentleman's objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I would not consent to putting such an amendment in this bill, because the committee reporting it did not place such an amendment in the bill, and the placing of even a nominal sum it seems to me as a precedent would be worse than that denounced by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As long as the fate of the bill hangs without any consideration—love and affection on the one hand and $10 on the other—if the gentleman will withdraw his objection I will donate to the United States the $10. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object under the statement made by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. PRAY. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to do that.

Mr. PRAY. It seems to me there is not any principle involved here as serious as all that. In fact, there is no principle involved here at all. Gentlemen talk about establishing precedents. Precedents have already been established for the passage of this bill as it is. These people have been anxiously awaiting results for the last three or four months, and they want to know whether they are going to get the jail. They need it badly, and Congress can give it to them without breaking precedents. If they are obliged to pay any considerable amount for the jail, they can not afford to take it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Montana, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily passed. If we can ascertain the value of these improvements, I will offer an amendment requiring the county to pay the full value of the improvements; but the Interior Department reported that the buildings were not of much value, and for the reasons I have stated we did not require the county to pay for them to make a jail in which to confine citizens of Hill County when they are violators of the law, which will conserve a very useful purpose. Certainly it is better than remaining on the abandoned reservation without any use whatever. To require that for the sake of precedent that a mere nominal consideration should be put on this bill does not meet my idea of public duty from any standpoint.

Mr. MANN. How long has Hot Springs been in the gentleman's district?

Mr. ROBINSON. Hot Springs has been in my district since my service in the House began, and I hope it will continue there until my service in this great body expires. Now, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. In the report of the department calling attention to the bill it states that there is another bill pending elsewhere proposing to grant to the State these buildings for agriculture, manual training, and other educational purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the other bill is to grant the land. Of course, that would carry the buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the buildings thereon; and the statement is made there that these buildings are of no value.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it seems they would be valuable for that purpose. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether his committee went into the question of the value of utilizing the buildings for that purpose rather than for the purpose of a jail?

Mr. ROBINSON. There was a Senate bill pending providing for a grant of that land and the committee reached the conclusion that the buildings would be more useful if applied for jail purposes than for an agricultural and educational institution. We could not conceive how the jail could be of any value to an educational institution, and we found that Hill County did need a jail very badly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, is this building a jail? Is it not a building that was used by troops?

Mr. ROBINSON. The building to be granted by this bill consists of a jail only and fixtures.

Mr. PRAY. The other bill in all probability will not go through at this session of Congress. The passage of this bill could not interfere in any manner whatsoever with the other bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. No. The other bill will probably not be passed at this session. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the consideration of this bill be temporarily passed to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] asks that the consideration of this bill be passed temporarily, without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LICENSING OF PLEASURE YACHTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22650) to replace sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may cause yachts used and employed exclusively as pleasure vessels or designed as models of naval architecture, if built and owned in compliance with the provisions of sections 4133 to 4135, to be licensed on terms which will authorize them to proceed from port to port of the United States and to foreign ports without entering or clearing at the customhouse; such license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may prescribe. Such vessels, so enrolled and licensed, shall not be allowed to transport merchandise or carry passengers for pay. Such vessels shall have their name and port placed on some conspicuous portion of their hulls. Such vessels shall, in all respects, except as above, be subject to the laws of the United States, and shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture for any violation of the provisions of this title.

SEC. 2. That every yacht, except those of 15 gross tons or under, visiting a foreign country under the provisions of sections 4214, 4215, and 4217 of the Revised Statutes shall, on her return to the United States, make due entry at the customhouse of the port at which, on such return, she shall arrive.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] reserves the right to object.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the gentleman in charge of this bill explain it, and especially the letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says that—

> This department doubts the advisability of making this unqualified exemption, as it would tend to facilitate smuggling in small boats along the northern frontier and endanger the revenue.

Now, it seems to me that this is of some importance, coming, as it does, from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but if the gentleman had read further on and would then examine the bill he would find that the amendment suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury had been incorporated in the bill, so as to protect the Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. I had not gotten through. Does the gentleman think that this protects all that feature of it, that might permit any smuggling to take place in these small boats?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so, and that is the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the title of this bill is "To replace sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes."

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I assume that the purpose is to amend those provisions of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and I think the amendments I shall offer will put the bill in the proper form.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What particular class of American citizens would be benefited by this bill—just the yacht owners?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; not only the yacht owners, but a large class of people who live on the Northern Lakes and on the Detroit River, who own pleasure vessels of various descriptions and who have summer homes on the Canadian side. This bill will permit them to go over the Lakes or Detroit River from ports of the United States to the Canadian ports and return without entering or clearing at the customhouse.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman mean excursion boats?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I refer to yachts and pleasure boats on the Lakes. Many own launches and yachts and have summer homes in Canada, and go over on Saturdays and Sundays and holidays to the Canadian side to their summer homes. Without this legislation they are put to great inconvenience in entering or clearing at the customhouse.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me in that connection?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the first section of this bill merely extend a privilege of the same character to boats on the Great Lakes as now exists with reference to boats along the seaboard?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; the same privilege as now exists on the seaboard, referred to in section 4214; and the first section of this bill amends section 4214.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but only in this regard: It strikes out the words "by sea." Section 4214, Revised Statutes, is construed by the Department of Commerce and Labor as applying to the ocean and not to the Great Lakes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It extends privileges, then, to these owners of pleasure boats on the Lakes such as are enjoyed now on the ocean?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And only that?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. The Secretary of the Treasury, to guard against danger of smuggling, suggested an amendment, which is added by the committee as an amendment to the second section of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there any precaution taken to prevent these boats from smuggling in going back and forth?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. The matter has been gone over very carefully. The same penalties against smuggling apply to these vessels as to other vessels. We not only submitted the bill to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor but also to the Secretary of the Treasury, and have the approval of both of them.

Mr. FOSTER. In making frequent trips across the Lakes or the river it would be different from going across the ocean.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This applies only to pleasure boats of less than 15 tons; small boats.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They would not cross the ocean.

Mr. FOSTER. I know; but it is usually a more difficult matter to carry on smuggling in case of a vessel only crossing the ocean than one making frequent trips across some narrow portion of a lake.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, even if it does encourage a little smuggling, that would be in the direction of free trade.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, we ought to get it by law and not by stealth.

Mr. SABATH. Stealth. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; by stealth. However, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to exempt the master or person in charge of a yacht or vessel arriving from a foreign port or place with dutiable articles on board from reporting to the customs officer of the United States at the port or place at which said yacht or vessel shall arrive, and deliver in to said officer a manifest of all dutiable articles brought from a foreign country in such yachts or vessels.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts not consistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend, by striking out on page 1, line 3, the words "That the" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows: 'Section 4214. The' and by adding quotation marks after the word 'title,' on page 2, line 12, and by striking out on page 2, line 13, the words 'Section 2. That' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'Section 4218' and by adding quotation marks at the end of the section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is an amendment to the title.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the title, so that it will read as follows:
"A bill to amend sections 4214 and 4218 of the Revised Statutes."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION OF INSANE PERSONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19544) to amend section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the immigration act approved February 20, 1907, be amended as follows:

After the word "epileptics" insert the words "insane persons," so that section 9 shall read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States any alien subject to any of the following disabilities: Idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, insane persons, or persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section; and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, and in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "amended," insert the words "so as to read."

Page 1, strike out lines 6 and 7, the words proposed to be stricken out being as follows:

After the word "epileptics," insert the words "insane persons," so that section 9 shall read as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the present consideration of this bill, I desire to say that I am doing so, not for any reason that I have any objection to the bill itself, but simply for the purpose of saying a few words about the report accompanying the bill.

As you will notice, the bill provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel to bring to the United States any alien subject to any of the following disabilities: Idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, insane persons, or persons afflicted with tuberculosis or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section—and notwithstanding the fact that I am against any additional unreasonable restrictive immigration legislation, I wish to go on record in favor of this bill and am desirous of informing the membership of this House that I am not opposed to any bill which honestly aims to protect our country from the criminal, the insane, or those suffering from loathsome, dangerous, or contagious diseases, or legislation which aims to protect our country from gross negligence on the part of the steamship companies.

And right here I desire to state that the people I have the honor of representing and those for whom I at times speak are not opposed to any legislation which tends in the right direction nor to legislation which actually may protect us from really objectionable immigration and which might be detrimental to the welfare of our country. And I feel confident that they, as well as myself, are as desirous as any professional and capital-making individual of keeping out the idiot, the imbecile, the epileptic, insane persons, persons suffering from tuberculosis or with loathsome, dangerous, or contagious diseases, or others that are actually undesirable.

What I take exception to is the unfair and unwarranted report accompanying this bill, which, on page 2, embodies a part of a report of the New York State Board of Alienists for the year 1911, and reads as follows:

It must be remembered that foreign countries look with favor upon the emigration to America of diseased and defective persons. Examination by American officials at the ports of embarkation in Europe has been strenuously opposed by certain foreign Governments, and it is a notorious fact, commented upon in every annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, that the steamship companies make only the most perfunctory medical examination of passengers upon their departure for America. Thus there are no obstacles in the way of diseased persons embarking for this country. In the case of those returning, however, the conditions are reversed. The passengers are carefully scrutinized by ships' surgeons at the gangway, as they embark at the port of New York, and those who do not satisfy the steamship officials or the representatives of foreign Governments stationed on such ships are peremptorily refused passage, even although they have been only a short time away from the countries to which they still owe allegiance. Cases are not decided individually, upon their merits, but as soon as it is learned that an applicant for passage has been in an institution for the insane he is at once rejected. It can be seen that, with an unimpeded flow of inferior immigrants to this country, and with an outflow which is so carefully regulated that only the prosperous and sound can return, we must ultimately become the asylum for an increasing number of those unable to sustain themselves.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this portion of this report is unjustifiable by any facts or any evidence that can be substantiated. Again, on the same page, the report contains another extract from page 22 of the same New York Board of Alienists, which reads as follows:

For the first few years after the commencement of that remarkable migration of the races of southern and eastern Europe to this country (to which Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia have contributed nearly 500,000 persons a year), it is noted that the increase of patients of those nationalities in the State hospitals was gradual. By 1905, however, it was possible to predict that when the effects of the "new immigration" commenced to be felt the "old immigration" (of Germans, Irish, and Scandinavians) would be outdone in the numbers of insane added to the foreign-born population of our State hospitals. To-day that prediction is fulfilled, and during the year more than 55 per cent of the aliens deported by the United States Immigration Service were natives of those three countries.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that the figures as well as the statements contained in these two extracts are incorrect, and furthermore, are direct insults not only to the people coming from Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia, but as well to those from Germany, Ireland, and Scandinavia.

These people never have been and are not now a burden upon the State of New York, as they pay more than their proportionate share toward maintaining the public institutions. And again, Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to take exception to the extract in this report, purporting to be an article from the New York Times, which purports to be furnished by the secretary, McGarr, of the same lunacy commission, and which reads as follows:

INSANE ALIENS.

The Times is informed by Secretary McGarr, of the State commission in lunacy, that of the 31,432 insane patients under treatment in the 14 State hospitals on February 10 last, 13,163, or 41.9 per cent, were aliens. Foreign-born patients have increased since the Federal census of December 31, 1903, by 1,552, or 13.4 per cent. In the two State hospitals for the criminal insane there were 1,230 patients on February 10, of whom nearly 44.4 per cent were of alien birth; the Federal census of 1910 showed a percentage of aliens to total population in this State of 29.9 per cent.

The prevalence of insanity among immigrants is evidently much greater than among the native born. Of the 5,700 patients admitted to the civil hospitals for the year ending September 30, 1911, 2,737, or 48 per cent, were aliens, and 1,481, or 26 per cent, were of alien parentage, while only 1,224, less than 26 per cent, were of native stock. Of the whole number, the nativity of but 218, which is 3.8 per cent, was not ascertainable. Insanity among the foreign peoples of this city occurs in a still larger percentage of cases. Of the first admissions to the hospitals 2,006 out of 3,221 residents of the city were of foreign birth; that is 64.1 per cent, although the foreign-born population is but 40.4 per cent of the whole.

In this article, as well as in the two above-mentioned extracts, the percentages and the statistical data are so juggled as to place the foreign people in a disadvantageous position. I admit that the deplorable conditions under which these people are often obliged to work and live drive some of them insane, but, on the whole, if you take into consideration the percentage of the foreign population of New York and the percentage of those in the insane asylums you will find that it is not greater—yes, not as large—than that of the native born who at no time are obliged to undergo the hardships, the trials, and the tribulations that the foreign-born citizen must.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard the gentlemen representing this New York Board of Alienists before our committee complain of the great sum of money which it costs the State of New York to provide for these people, and I have seen and heard them give figures—what it costs the State of New York annually, nearly $8,000,000, to provide for its feeble-minded and its insane. On one of the occasions I have remarked to them, and I will state it again, that if the public officials of New York State having charge of these institutions would be more careful and practice some economy in expending the public money that one-third of that amount would amply suffice to provide properly for the maintenance and care of all its unfortunates of these institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be unjust or unfair, but I can not help believing that the main reason for these reports published by this board is that these gentlemen, these members of the New York State Board of Alienists, are endeavoring to develop a sentiment in our country which will force this House to enact legislation creating a new board of medical examiners which will be composed only of the specialists and alienists from their school. And that this is their desire I can substantiate by their own evidence before our committee only a few months ago.

We in the city of Chicago have as large a foreign population in proportion to the population as the city of New York, and I have yet to hear a single complaint from any source whatever about the cost of the large number that may be confined in our city, county, or State institutions, and I feel confident, notwithstanding the fact that I have not the statistics at hand, that the percentage of foreign born and those of foreign parentage is not greater than that of the natives. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this bill has given certain gentlemen again an opportunity to inquire why the Dillingham bill, which passed the Senate some time ago, can not receive consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to inform these gentlemen that notwithstanding the fact they are advocates of restrictive legislation and desirous to pass most any restrictive bill, having confidence in their judgment, I feel satisfied that they never would or could vote for the Dillingham bill. Personally I consider it a makeshift—a bill for which no fair-minded man who desires intelligent, fair, and just legislation would vote. It is a hodgepodge. It is a bill composed of six or eight other bills, and sent over to this House in such shape that really no one can tell what some of its provisions mean and aim to accomplish.

If anyone will read it carefully he will find that it repeals the Chinese-exclusion act. Now I shall pause for an answer, and inquire, Are there any Members who desire to go on record in favor of repealing the Chinese-exclusion act? Or are there any Members who would be willing to vote for the now known and celebrated Root amendment? Surely not.

If the time permitted I could point out many other objectionable features in the bill which this Democratic House would never vote for. What we stand for is fair and just legislation—legislation which is actually demanded by and would be beneficial to the people and to our country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that I can not understand how anybody can object to the consideration and passage of this bill. Every possible source of information indicates the necessity of the passage of this legislation. I myself regret that the bill is not more general in its terms, but it is a step in the right direction. It is an improvement on existing law, and therefore I hope that the bill will pass. Of course, we are not enacting into law the report of the committee accompanying the bill, but statistics in my possession and information which I deem reliable disclose an alarming situation with reference to the alien insane, idiots, and imbeciles in some of our State institutions. For instance, in the State of New York the cost of maintaining foreign insane in the institutions of that State exceeds $4,000,000 per annum. That is only in one State. I sincerely hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to be informed whether my understanding is correct, that all this bill does is to insert in the existing law the words "insane persons"? Is that correct?

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state the change which the bill makes.

Mr. MANN. Is that the only change it makes?

Mr. BURNETT. It increases the penalty from $100 to $200.

Mr. MANN. Those are the only changes?

Mr. BURNETT. Those are the only changes.

Mr. MANN. If consent is given for the consideration of this bill, is it intended to have other amendments offered?

Mr. BURNETT. None by me. I have not thought of any such thing. I want this bill to pass on its merits, and I hope it will pass in just that way.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether anybody else intends to offer any amendments?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know of any others. This is an important and urgent bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. While I should like to offer some amendments to the bill, I shall not do it in the event that unanimous consent is given for its consideration, because I understand from the gentleman from Illinois that there will probably be objection if other amendments are offered.

Mr. MANN. I should like to suggest that this is a matter that might be passed on under an armed neutrality agreement, without involving the main question in reference to immigration. I think no one objects to these proposed changes, and the injection of anything else would probably prevent the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no doubt it would, and for that reason I hope no gentleman will jeopardize its passage by offering any amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, one statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] should not be permitted to pass unchallenged. Some statements in this report, consisting of quotations from newspaper clippings, are accurate. It costs the State of New York more than $2,000,000 a year to take care of the alien insane.

Mr. ROBINSON. It costs more than $4,000,000 a year to provide for the alien insane.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am speaking of the insane who escape the scrutiny of immigration officials that come into the State. It costs altogether about $9,000,000 a year to take care of the insane in New York, $2,000,000 of which is due to the coming in of insane aliens because of inspection that is not adequate. In the sundry civil bill this year provision has been made for some additional inspectors, who are to be especially qualified to detect mental defectives, and it would be of great value to the entire country if legislation could be enacted that will prevent the European countries from relieving themselves of the burden of taking care of the mental defectives and placing it on the various States of the Union. I believe that the bill is a very wise one and should be enacted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. But the House has not yet given permission to consider it.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration and that the previous question may be considered as ordered on the bill and amendment to final passage.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment shall be considered as agreed to and the bill be passed and a motion to reconsider laid on the table. [Laughter.] That would dispose of it in one motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill; that the committee amendment be considered as agreed to and the bill be considered as passed, and a motion to reconsider lay on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that that will prevent an amendment being offered to the bill putting in the educational test for immigrants.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is exactly what is intended.

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that a moment ago I made the statement that I myself would like to offer some amendments to the bill, but I was assured by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber that if amendments were to be offered objection would be made to its consideration.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I know that the gentleman from Arkansas feels the same way I do about the educational test, and if the gentleman from Alabama wishes to put the bill through in that way I shall not object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts in regard to these amendments being offered to the bill, that if the amendments were offered they would not be germane and could not be considered.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think they are germane.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they are not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I know what I am talking about. I was on the committee that reported it, and examined it thoroughly.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, no gentleman in this House has worked harder, in season and out of season, to get a report and action of the House on the illiteracy-test bill than I have. I have tried by all means to have it reached on the call of committees on Wednesdays, but the Immigration Committee has not been reached on that call. I have besieged the doors of the Committee on Rules and have been unable to secure a rule for its consideration. I have a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Rules, which I desire to insert in the RECORD.

In that letter he says that the Rules Committee could not give us a rule at this session. I asked for a rule on the Dillingham bill, as substituted by the Burnett bill by the House Committee on Immigration. The letter states that the committee could not give consideration to that rule at this session or report it out at this session, on account of many other matters before the committee. That is the substance of the letter, and that at the beginning of the next session, in early December, a rule would be reported by which the bill could be taken up and action be had on it. That being true, and the fact that one objection would defeat the bill now under consideration, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED], and on account of the acute conditions that prevail as to the incoming insane aliens, I hope that no effort at this time will be made to load this bill with amendments that might jeopardize its passage.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. I have been shown a letter from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and a letter from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I think one was addressed to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the other to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY]. I can not say which letter makes the explicit statement, but one or the other of those letters says definitely that we shall have a rule to consider this Burnett-Dillingham bill in December. Is that so?

Mr. BURNETT. That is true as to the letter from Mr. HENRY to myself.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. One thing more. I have been shown replicas of letters sent by the gentleman from Alabama himself, stating to various Members on the Democratic side that they have done their best to help him to secure the rule, and that it is impossible to get it.

Mr. BURNETT. That is true.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it not true, also, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] asked for the entire day of next Thursday for the discussion of the majority and minority reports on the steel investigation, when in fact there is no bill before the House in relation to the matter?

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will put in the fact that the request was objected to.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not on that side of the House, but on this side by Mr. AUSTIN, of Tennessee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the proposition to restrict immigration in such a way as to keep undesirables out of the country, but I think it would be particularly unfortunate to complicate with the general question of immigration the bill under consideration. It is urgently important that this legislation should be enacted. I have here the hearings before the committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, in which the statement is made that there are at the present time 8,000 alien insane, one-quarter of the whole, supported at the public expense in the New York State Hospital, at a cost to the State of $2,000,000 annually. It says that the great number of alien insane is being rapidly increased, and they want the law amended in such a way as to protect the public. I am personally in favor of amending the immigration laws so as to keep out all undesirables. But I hope that no gentleman occupying that position will object to the consideration of this bill or insist that it be complicated with amendments, because in my judgment it is legislation that is urgently needed.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has well said that the bill which we now have under consideration is of the greatest importance. The purpose of the bill is to check the influx of insane aliens to this country.

Under the law as it now exists insane aliens are debarred from this country, but there is no penalty on the steamship companies for bringing them in. Under section 9 of the present immigration law steamship companies are subject to a fine of $100 for bringing in aliens who are idiots, imbeciles, epileptics, or who are afflicted with tuberculosis, and so forth. This bill proposes to make this penalty $200 and to make it apply to persons afflicted with insanity. There is a growing necessity for this law. The insane asylums of New York and some other Northern States are being filled with insane aliens coming from eastern and southern Europe, and if immigration from these countries is not checked the asylums of the Southern and Western States will soon begin to be crowded with this same class of people.

The steamship companies do not care how many of these people they dump on our shores so long as they can get the passage money, and they will continue to pour them in unless they are made to feel the heavy hand of the law forbidding it. I will here quote from the report of my Committee on Immigration on this bill:

An acute condition has arisen in certain sections of the country, conspicuously in New York State, where great numbers of insane aliens become the inmates of the State hospitals and are cared for at the State's expense. This imposes a tremendous burden upon the State from a financial standpoint as well as throwing it into jeopardy from excessive numbers of insane aliens.

The Commissioner of Immigration in his report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, has this to say in regard to the question:

One of the most useful provisions of the present statute is section 9, by which a fine of $100 is assessed against any steamship line that brings to a United States port an alien afflicted with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with tuberculosis, or with idiocy, imbecility, or epilepsy. During the past year such fines were assessed in 246 cases, the aggregate amount being $24,600, of which $23,700 was on account of the first, $100 on account of the second, and $800 on account of the third class, respectively. It is believed this statute would be much more effective, however, if the amount of the fine were made considerably larger—sufficiently large to compel the transportation companies as a measure of self-protection to use greater care in the medical inspection of embarking passengers. The fine should also be made to cover cases of insanity, a class omitted from the present statute probably by inadvertence.

On page 9, report of New York State Board of Alienists for the year ended September 30, 1911, is the following:

It must be remembered that foreign countries look with favor upon the migration to America of diseased and defective persons. Examination by American officials at the ports of embarkation in Europe has been strenuously opposed by certain foreign Governments, and it is a notorious fact, commented upon in every annual report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, that the steamship companies make only the most perfunctory medical examination of passengers upon their departure for America. Thus there are no obstacles in the way of diseased persons embarking for this country. In the case of those returning, however, the conditions are reversed. The passengers are carefully scrutinized by ships' surgeons at the gangway, as they embark at the port of New York, and those who do not satisfy the steamship officials or the representatives of foreign Governments stationed on such ships are peremptorily refused passage, even although they have been only a short time away from the countries to which they still owe allegiance. Cases are not decided individually, upon their merits, but as soon as it is learned that an applicant for passage has been in an institution for the insane he is at once rejected. It can be seen that, with an unimpeded flow of inferior immigrants to this country, and with an outflow which is so carefully regulated that only the prosperous and sound can return, we must ultimately become the asylum for an increasing number

On page 22 of the same report is the following:

For the first few years after the commencement of that remarkable migration of the races of southern and eastern Europe to this country (to which Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia have contributed nearly 500,000 persons a year) it is noted that the increase of patients of those nationalities in the State hospitals was gradual. By 1905, however, it was possible to predict that when the effects of the "new immigration" commenced to be felt the "old immigration" (of Germans, Irish, and Scandinavians) would be outdone in the numbers of insane added to the foreign-born population of our State hospitals. To-day that prediction is fulfilled, and during the year more than 55 per cent of the aliens deported by the United States Immigration Service were natives of those three countries.

The New York Times of March 28, 1912, says:

INSANE ALIENS.

The Times is informed by Secretary McGarr, of the State commission in lunacy, that of the 31,432 insane patients under treatment in the 14 State hospitals on February 10 last, 13,163, or 41.9 per cent, were aliens. Foreign-born patients have increased since the Federal census of December 31, 1903, by 1,552, or 13.4 per cent. In the two State hospitals for the criminal insane there were 1,230 patients on February 10, of whom nearly 44.4 per cent were of alien birth; the Federal census of 1910 showed a percentage of aliens to total population in this State of 29.9 per cent.

The prevalence of insanity among immigrants is evidently much greater than among the native born. Of the 5,700 patients admitted to the civil hospitals for the year ending September 30, 1911, 2,737, or 48 per cent, were aliens, and 1,481, or 26 per cent, were of alien parentage, while only 1,224, less than 26 per cent, were of native stock. Of the whole number, the nativity of but 218, which is 3.8 per cent, was not ascertainable. Insanity among the foreign peoples of this city occurs in a still larger percentage of cases. Of the first admissions to the hospitals 2,006 out of 3,221 residents of the city were of foreign birth; that is 64.1 per cent, although the foreign-born population is but 40.4 per cent of the whole.

The extracts from the report of the New York State Board of Alienists show an alarming condition. These reputable officials state that many foreign countries encourage the emigration of their insane and diseased people to this country in order to rid themselves of their care and expense. Then, is it not high time that we begin to protect ourselves against such outrages by most drastic laws? It is believed that placing a heavier penalty on the steamship companies for bringing them in will make them more careful about receiving them and in that way greatly check the outrages being perpetrated on our own people.

The following extracts from the New York State Hospitals Bulletin of April, 1912, show an appalling condition. On pages 5 and 6 it is said:

In February, 1912, there were 31,432 patients in the 14 State hospitals, 41.9 per cent of whom were of foreign birth. Careful studies have shown that the frequency of insanity in our foreign population is 2.19 times greater than those of native birth.

On page 13 the following is stated:

The relatively large contribution of Italy to the population of the hospitals for the criminal insane is worthy of comment. Although the Italians constitute but 5 per cent of the foreign-born insane population of the civil hospitals, they number 23.1 per cent of the foreign-born of the hospitals for the criminal insane. This nationality also contributes largely to the prison population of the State. The report of the State superintendent of prisons for the year ending September 30, 1910, shows that the Italians constitute 36.6 per cent of the foreign-born prison population of the State.

Relatively, the Germans and Irish contribute a much smaller percentage of insane with criminal tendencies.

On page 21 is the following:

First admissions of various nationalities committed before having been in the United States 5 years.

	Patients residing in New York City.		Total in New York State.
	Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
Austria	53	13.5	73	14.3
Canada	5	1.3	13	2.5
England and Wales	8	2.0	14	2.7
France	7	1.8	7	1.4
Germany	34	8.7	41	8.1
Hungary and Bohemia	28	7.1	32	6.3
Ireland	31	7.9	36	7.1
Italy	49	12.5	69	13.6
Russia and Poland	113	28.8	142	27.9
Scandinavia	16	4.1	20	3.9
Scotland	3	.8	6	1.2
All other foreign countries	46	11.7	56	11.0
Total	393	100.0	509	100.0

This table shows conclusively that the larger part of the immigrants who are admitted to hospitals for the insane within five years after landing come from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Russia, and Poland.

On page 36 it is said:

13. The larger part of the immigrants who are admitted to a State hospital within five years after landing come from Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia.

14. The foreign born first admissions show a higher rate of illiteracy than the native born.

15. The largest percentages of foreign-born illiterates are found among the Austrians, Russians, and Italians.

On page 46 it is said:

At $262 per patient the total annual cost to the State of the hospital care of the foreign-born patients now in the civil hospitals is $3,448,706. So long as the yearly addition of immigrants to the hospitals continues to increase this annual burden will continue to grow.

At the rate of $2,882 per patient the admission of 2,737 new foreign-born patients to the State hospitals in 1911 will involve a total expense to the State before these patients are finally discharged of $7,888,034.

The New York Herald of April 13, 1912, speaking of conditions in that State, said:

Recently the Herald published statistics showing that more than 60 per cent of the occupants of charitable institutions and insane asylums in New York were foreign born and likely entered here under the lax system of the immigration authorities.

For the most part the immigrants come from the unhealthy parts of southern Europe and carry contagious diseases. Many are weak minded, a condition difficult to detect, especially in children, and they are sent here by their relatives abroad, because they can receive better care in American institutions. A majority of the immigrants get no further than this city, and prominent medical authorities here have often declared that the foreigners are responsible for much of the disease in the tenement quarters.

JULY 24, 1912.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT,
Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BURNETT: Permit me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 16, and to say that the same has had most careful consideration. Your request that the Committee on Rules take favorable action so as to bring before the House the Dillingham bill has been thoroughly considered.

On behalf of the Committee on Rules I will say, as chairman, that early in December of the next session of this Congress the bill will be brought, by rule, before the House of Representatives in order that it may be duly considered. Just at this time the condition of business before the Committee on Rules and in the House of Representatives is such as to render it impracticable to report a rule and give the bill consideration during the present session. Thanking you for your letter, I am,

Very truly, yours,

R. L. HENRY,
Chairman Committee on Rules,
House of Representatives.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just a word, if the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] will permit. This bill further guards, as I understand the gentleman from Alabama, the immigration of insane people from foreign countries to this country. Therefore, I made the request which I did, that it might be considered as passed. I want to say further, that while I have certain fixed notions about immigration to this country I have no stone to throw in the way of the consideration of an immigration bill, but being in the minority I am powerless, although I am told that for months past a Senate bill has rested upon the calendar. It seems, however, our friends, the majority side of the House, are side-stepping it until after the next election. Whom do they want to fool?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that I desire to say that while the gentleman was the Speaker of the House, during the last Congress, the Committee on Rules of that Congress had a similar resolution pending before it for months, and I do not know whether it was inspired by the former Speaker or not, but for some reason we were unable ever to get a resolution reported from that committee to make it in order when we were clamoring for it all of the time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, then as now, it was in the power of a majority of this House on any day, except Mondays and Wednesdays, to reach the calendar and consider and pass this bill. If you do not get a special rule, you have rules a plenty, if the majority of the House want to consider it on any day except Mondays and Wednesdays.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the former Speaker's clamor never did come in during the days in 1907, when we were trying to get a bill passed containing an illiteracy test for immigrants, when the gentleman was Speaker, and when he secured the absence of many of his side of the House, as we all saw him do, in order to break a quorum and defeat the passage of that bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama is mistaken, honestly I think, and I want him to take that back.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well. There were a hundred or two of them that were present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is again mistaken in that statement and I ask him to take it back.

Mr. BURNETT. If I am mistaken in the statement, of course I do not insist upon it, but that was the understanding and the statement of gentlemen upon the gentleman's side of the House who saw the performance.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I say again that the gentleman is mistaken in letter and substance.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well, let it go at that.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Then the gentleman withdraws that statement?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not withdraw the statement that I had that statement from Members on the gentleman's side.

Mr. CANNON. Then the statement is an unqualified untruth.

Mr. BURNETT. I am quoting from gentlemen on that side of the House who gave me the statement, and when the gentleman from Illinois states it is untrue he makes them out as stating an untruth.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the fact is the quorum was not broken, so the gentleman must be mistaken.

Mr. BURNETT. No; the quorum was not broken—I withdraw that part of the statement.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman makes the statement now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's statement is incorrect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor, and anybody who desires to interrupt must first address the Chair.

Mr. BURNETT. But the absence of enough Members was secured to defeat the proposition of the illiteracy test on the vote and not by breaking a quorum, as I erroneously stated.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I say again that a majority of the House then could have, as a majority of the House now can, on any day, except Mondays and Wednesdays, under the rules of the House, and without a special rule, consider and pass the Senate bill with or without the illiteracy test if it desires so to do.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. Under what is the House now proceeding?

The SPEAKER. It is proceeding under an effort to get unanimous consent to consider this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard any of these gentlemen who have interrupted the gentleman from Alabama reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. That kind of talk takes a very wide latitude.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman was not here.

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I have been here all of the time.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the request be put.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia object?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not. I wanted to know under what rule we were proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill and to consider the committee amendments as adopted and the bill passed and the motion to reconsider made and laid on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, there was no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That request has never been put. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I again submit the request which I made before, that unanimous consent be given for the immediate consideration of the bill and that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and committee amendments to final passage.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COVINGTON. Is there anything now before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is before the House a unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] reserves the right to object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Whether or not under the request of the gentleman from Illinois, if it is granted, the bill will be permitted to be amended?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman's request is granted, the bill can not be amended except by the committee amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask to have the request again stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will please again state his request.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my request was to facilitate the passage of a bill to which no one objected, and was that the bill might be taken up for consideration and that the previous question should be considered as ordered upon the bill and committee amendments to final passage.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman request it be considered in the House, or is it a House bill?

Mr. MANN. It is a House Calendar bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill and that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and committee amendments to final passage. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I gather from the statement of my distinguished colleague from Alabama that the Committee on Rules advised him that on account of the rush of other matters they have not time to consider a rule at this time. I do not know that I shall object to the present consideration of this particular bill, but when we approach the consideration of this bill I apprehend that it should be on a fair and correct basis of the facts in regard to it. For two months there has been pending before the Rules Committee of this House——

Mr. COVINGTON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not just now. A resolution making the Burnett immigration bill, a general restrictive bill, a special order. The Committee on Rules has considered dozens of special orders which have been brought to their attention subsequent to that time, and if we are not at this session to have consideration of general restrictive immigration legislation it should not be placed upon an incorrect excuse or attributed to a false reason. A suggestion has been made to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that during his Speakership a similar bill was reported, and the Committee on Rules of the Republican House would not act upon it. It is true; and just about that time organizations interested in the advancement and passage of general restrictive immigration legislation wrote to the Members of the House of Representatives asking how they stood on such legislation. They began at the top. They addressed one of their communications to the honorable Speaker of the House a little prior to March 14, and at that time the Speaker replied:

> I am in favor of all just, proper, and rational legislation along the lines of regulating foreign immigration, but am not in favor of every proposition to restrict foreign immigration that may be proposed. Undoubtedly the right sort of immigration is desirable and the wrong sort ought to be shut out.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not at this moment. At the same time a letter was addressed to the Democratic leader of the House, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and he answered in a letter under date of February 26, 1910——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman give me a chance to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I decline to yield. The letter addressed by the Farmers' Union to these gentlemen was——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I raise a question of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the question of order?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That the gentleman is not discussing the matter before the House, and that his remarks are not germane.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is whether there shall be unanimous consent to the request made by the gentleman from Illinois. Any gentleman can bring this matter to a head by calling for the regular order. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In the letter the question was asked:

> Are you in favor of securing without delay more stringent legislation along the lines of restricting foreign immigration?

To which Mr. UNDERWOOD replied, under date of February 26, 1910:

> Fourth. Securing without delay more stringent legislation along the line of restricting foreign immigration.
> I have for many years been in favor of restricting immigration. Some years ago, on my motion, an educational test for immigrants coming into this country was passed by the House of Representatives, but defeated in the Senate. This proposition will continue to have my hearty support.

I desire to read now from the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. RODDENBERY (continuing). Mr. HENRY, and from Mr. POU, of the Committee on Rules, and Mr. HARDWICK, of the Committee on Rules, and others.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the House grant unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill, that the previous question on the bill and committee amendments be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman can make no reservation of the right to object; the gentleman must know that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the right to demand the regular order, and that is equivalent to an objection. Is there objection now to the request of the gentleman that——

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to ask the Chair if it is not a fact as we are proceeding under unanimous consent that unanimous consent has to be acquired before the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is in order?

The SPEAKER. Why, that is exactly what the gentleman from Illinois is asking—unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand, Mr. Speaker, but he couples with the unanimous consent all of these provisos shutting off any amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could couple with it the Ten Commandments if he chose to do so. [Laughter.]

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does the request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from Illinois interrupt the proceedings and prevent the conclusion of my remarks touching the position of distinguished Democrats on this question?

The SPEAKER. It shuts the gentleman out absolutely.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I shall therefore be obliged to object. I am in favor of a fair hearing and will continue my remarks on another day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] objects. The question recurs, then, on the same request for unanimous consent to consider this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The extension desired is to put in the RECORD——

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the character of the gentleman's remarks, he referring to the attitude of other gentlemen in this House, I think the extension he proposes should be specifically stated, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his request. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INCREASING THE LIMIT OF COST OF CERTAIN PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6688) to repeal section 13 of the act approved March 2, 1907, entitled "An act amending an act entitled 'An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.'"

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I am going to ask to have this bill passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Why not pass the bill?

Mr. BURNETT. Oh, no. I understood that perhaps there has been an arrangement by which the lands involved have been deeded to the Government——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pass it, anyway.

Mr. MANN. Why not pass the bill?

Mr. BURNETT (continuing). And for that reason I agreed with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] that it be passed over.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has an agreement, all right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The authority would still be there.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand the matter has been settled, and I want to get the bill up and passed at this session; but if that has not been done, I want to confer with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] first. I told him I would request on Monday to have it passed over, and without further conversation with him I do not think it should be considered at this time. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the consideration of the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

PREVENTING THE MANUFACTURE, SALE, OR TRANSPORTATION OF ADULTERATED FOODS, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22526) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Third. If in package form, and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure, they are not plainly and correctly stated on the outside of the package," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Third. If in package form, the quantity of the contents be not plainly and conspicuously marked on the outside of the package in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count: Provided, however, That reasonable variations shall be permitted, and tolerances shall be established by rules and regulations made in accordance with the provisions of this act, which shall not in the average reduce the weight, measure, or numerical count below that marked on said package."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage: Provided, however, That no penalty of fine, imprisonment, or confiscation shall be enforced for any violation of its provisions as to domestic products prepared or foreign products imported prior to 18 months after its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 11, 12, and 13, strike out the following language, beginning with the comma after the word "Act": "which shall not in the average reduce the weight, measure, or numerical count below that marked on said package."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will request the gentleman from New York to wait for a moment. There is one more committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 19, by striking out the word "eighteen" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve," so that it will read "twelve months after its passage."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, on page 2, lines 14 and 15, the words "That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

The United States Supreme Court has held that an act of Congress takes effect from the time of its approval, unless otherwise specified in the act. Congress should not include a declaration that is unnecessary under the decisions of the court.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I concede the accuracy of the statement of the gentleman from New York. Under ordinary circumstances referred to an act ought not to contain the expression, but, as the gentleman will observe, immediately after that clause in the pending bill there is a proviso which sets forth that the enforcement of the act shall begin 12 months after the date of its passage. At the same time the establishment of the tolerances provided in the bill and the creation of the machinery of administration must begin at once. Consequently it is of some importance that the language of this act remain as it is. It makes clear to all persons who may have to comply with it the exact time when it will be enforced.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act becomes effective except that part of the act which is specifically excepted from the operation of the rule as laid down by the courts—the law becomes effective, but under the act the penalty of confiscation shall not be enforced until a period of 12 months after the approval of the act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman in reference to the time when the act takes effect is absolutely correct. When this bill was first prepared there was this difficulty in reference to it: It was not desired to put the act into effect until a period of time had elapsed after its passage except as to that part of it which permitted regulations to be made.

The regulations would have to be made before the act would go into actual effect. Therefore, instead of providing that only so much of the act should take immediate effect as concerned the matter of regulation, the item in the bill provides that the act shall take effect; but, following that, it provides the enforcement of the act shall not take effect itself—plain language—for 12 or 18 months, as the case may be, depending upon the adoption of the amendment.

It seems to me that without the provision inserted here, that the act shall take effect upon its passage, the people who would obtain copies of the act would be entirely misled as to when the act does take effect. While it may be considered a matter of tautology and the statement of a truism, yet with the other provision in the bill it was thought desirable, and I think it is still desirable, to have that provision inserted there for the information of people who are interested in the bill. People all over the United States in the manufacturing business are very much interested in the provisions of this law and desire to know when and how far it takes effect. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment under the peculiar circumstances surrounding this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am by no means convinced by the gentleman, and if I had been drawing the bill I would have used the word "approval" instead of "passage."

Mr. MANN. It might never be approved. It is passed when it is approved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a term not used in legislation. Laws do not take effect on their passage.

Mr. MANN. "Passage" is correct. An act is not passed until it is approved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the experts on the pure-food law are standing together on this matter——

Mr. MANN. I admit the impeachment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I shall defer to their judgment and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Maryland and myself are standing together on this matter.

Mr. COVINGTON. The gentleman from Illinois and myself usually stand together on matters relating to the pure-food law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the amendment, and in that way will relieve the gentlemen of the embarrassment under which they are laboring.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. COVINGTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR PORTO RICO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10169) to provide for holding the district court of the United States for Porto Rico during the absence from the island of the United States district judge, and for the trial of cases in the event of the disqualification of or inability to act by the said judge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the United States district judge of the district of Porto Rico shall be absent from the said district, and that fact shall be made to appear by the certificate in writing of the United States attorney or marshal of that district, filed in the office of the clerk of the United States district court for said district, or when for any reason the said judge shall or may be disqualified or unable to act as such in any cause pending in the district court of the United States for Porto Rico, and that fact shall be made to appear either by proper order entered in the record of said cause by the regular district judge, or by the certificate in writing of the United States attorney or marshal of that district filed in the office of the clerk of the United States district court for said district, the governor of Porto Rico may, by writing filed in the said clerk's office, designate a justice of the supreme court of Porto Rico either as temporary judge of said district court or as special judge thereof; and the temporary judge so designated as aforesaid shall have and may exercise within said district, during the absence of the regular district judge, all the power of every kind by law vested in said district judge, and after the return of said district judge to said district, shall continue to have and exercise said powers with respect to any cause, the trial of which shall have been commenced before him or which shall have been submitted to him for decision prior to the return of said district judge; and the special judge so designated as aforesaid shall have and may exercise within said district all the power of every kind by law vested in said district judge with respect to any cause named in the writing by the governor, filed as aforesaid, designating the said special judge as aforesaid: Provided, That no additional compensation shall be paid to either such temporary district judge or special district judge for services rendered pursuant to such designation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask who has charge of this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was introduced and reported by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi the facts in regard to the necessity for this legislation as I understand them.

There is now no provision in the law under which the district court can be held in Porto Rico in the absence or disqualification of the district judge.

Mr. SISSON. I gathered that from the bill. I should like to inquire about the compensation of the judge who sits in the absence of the regular judge. Is any additional expense imposed upon the Federal Government to pay the salary of the judge who sits temporarily in the absence of the regular judge?

Mr. MANN. There is a proviso in the bill that there shall be no additional expense.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The bill expressly provides that.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, the Federal judge loses his salary during his absence.

Mr. MANN. The bill says that no additional compensation shall be paid to either such temporary district judge or special district judge for services rendered pursuant to such designation.

Mr. SISSON. I did not have the bill before me.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It protects the Government from any additional expense, and is intended as a matter of public convenience.

Mr. SISSON. If additional compensation could be allowed, the regular judge might be encouraged to be absent; and he might be absent for 12 months. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that that is taken care of in the bill, which provides that there shall be no additional expense incurred in such cases. Mr. CLAYTON, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is the author of this bill, and his report, made to the House on the same, sets forth the facts fully, and is as follows:

[House Report No. 614, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

TEMPORARY OR SPECIAL JUDGE, UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF PORTO RICO.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 10169):

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10169) to provide for holding the District Court of the United States for Porto Rico during the absence from the island of the United States district judge and for the trial of cases in the event of the disqualification of or inability to act by the said judge, report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill seeks to make provision for the designation by the Governor of Porto Rico of a justice of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico to act, either as temporary judge of the United States District Court for Porto Rico or as a special judge thereof, during the absence of the judge of the said court or his disqualification to sit in any case or cases before that court. Such temporary or special judge would, under the provisions of the bill, receive no compensation in addition to that received by him as justice of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico. Its enactment would remedy such a situation as that which existed during the April (1911) term of the District Court of Porto Rico when the late Judge John J. Jenkins was in his last illness and the business of the court was suspended. In fact it was this very condition which called attention to the necessity for such legislation as it is here proposed.

In the second contingency mentioned—that is, in case of the disqualification of the United States district judge to sit in any case—it would be necessary without this proposed amendment of the law for a judge to be sent from the United States to Porto Rico. It is not settled that a circuit judge or a circuit justice has the power to assign a district or circuit judge from one of the districts in continental United States to the district of Porto Rico. At all events it would seem wise to save the expense of sending a district judge to Porto Rico by a proper measure such as your committee believe this bill to be.

The enactment of the legislation was recommended by the Attorney General in his letter to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary under date of April 25, 1911, which letter and the memorandum therein mentioned for the Secretary of War from Gov. Colton, of Porto Rico, under date of April 20, 1911, are hereto appended.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, April 25, 1911.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CLAYTON: The Secretary of War advises me that he has had a talk with you with respect to procuring some legislation under which during the absence of the United States district judge for Porto Rico a justice of the supreme court of the island may act in his stead. Both Judge Jenkins, United States district judge, and Gov. Colton recommend the passage of such an act, and it would seem to me to be quite necessary that there should be some such legislation. It may be a question whether or not under the general power of a circuit judge or circuit justice to assign a district or circuit judge from one district to another a judge from one of the districts in the United States proper could be assigned to Porto Rico. Aside from that the expense of sending a judge from the mainland to the island is worthy of consideration. The supreme court of the island is composed of a chief justice and four associate justices, two of whom are Americans and three native Porto Ricans. During the absence from the island of the regular United States district judge, it seems to me that one of these justices might properly hold the district court, and I have drafted a bill, which I inclose for your consideration, which would authorize that to be done.

I also inclose a memorandum from the Governor of Porto Rico and a letter from Judge Jenkins recommending this legislation.

Faithfully, yours,

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

[Memorandum for the Secretary of War.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 20, 1911.

There is considerable business pending in the United States District Court for Porto Rico, and the time for opening its April term has passed.

Judge Jenkins, the incumbent, is in the United States and is in such ill health as to make his return at all problematical, and under the most favorable circumstances impossible for two or three months.

Meanwhile all business of the court is suspended, and the rights of litigants are thereby prejudiced, and there is no one with judicial authority to act upon applications for emergency writs or to sign orders; neither is there any authority in law for the designation of a substitute judge during the absence or disability of the regular incumbent.

To relieve the immediate situation, as well as to enable the designation of a substitute judge whenever necessary in an emergency or when the regular judge may be absent on leave, it is suggested that Congress be requested to authorize the President to designate one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico to act, without extra compensation, as judge of the United States district court during any absence of the regular judge.

Attached hereto is a letter from Judge Jenkins upon this subject.

Respectfully submitted.

GEO. R. COLTON,
Governor of Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT M'HENRY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6354) to perpetuate and preserve Fort McHenry and the grounds connected therewith as a Government reservation under the control of the Secretary of War and to authorize its partial use as a museum of historic relics.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Fort McHenry and the Government grounds therewith connected shall remain a Government reservation under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States and in the control of the War Department for military purposes: Provided, That said fort proper and appurtenant grounds may, with the assent and under the control of the Secretary of War, be occupied as a military museum under such rules and regulations as he, in his discretion, may prescribe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ROBINSON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman the area and location of this reservation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, the area of Fort McHenry is now 50 acres. Formerly there were 52¾ acres, but 2¾ acres were given by the Government to the Skinner Shipbuilding & Drydock Co., who now maintain a drydock for the use of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the purpose in making the reservation?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is primarily to take care of one of the historic forts of this country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the committee consider the administrative cost of the proposition?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am not a member of that committee. I am simply representing Senator RAYNER for the bill. I can not see where there will be any expense, except, probably, cutting the grass and keeping the buildings and fortifications in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the reservation any source of revenue?

Mr. LINTHICUM. None whatever.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman knows that it will require a superintendent and other employees to take charge of it and look after it, will it not?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is Government property, with Government buildings on it, and troops have been there until within the last 10 days, and no doubt troops will be placed there later on. There are officers' quarters and quarters for soldiers, and the Government naturally will not allow its property to run down.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why not keep it for that purpose?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It will be kept for that purpose. I will say to the gentleman that the primary reason for this bill is that for the past 10 years there have been efforts by various parties to use these grounds for other purposes. Eight years ago the Agricultural Department wanted these grounds as a quarantine station for cattle, and it was only by the alertness of the citizens of Baltimore in procuring a lease of these grounds from the Government for a nominal rent that we kept it from being turned into a quarantine station for cattle at that time.

Mr. ROBINSON. How far is it from Baltimore?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is in Baltimore. At the time of the Battle of Fort McHenry it was about 4 miles. I think the gentleman remembers the historic facts connected with the old fort.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Is not this place that you propose to make a reservation probably the most historic point in all Maryland connected with the War of 1812?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think we Marylanders and all patriotic societies consider it the most historic point.

Mr. FINLEY. I agree to that, and that is the real reason why the passage of this bill is urged.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the gentleman from South Carolina agree that it will involve no cost to the Government?

Mr. FINLEY. I think the cost to the Government would be inconsiderable. I am one of those who believe that to honor those who have gone before us and to mark the spot of greatest historic interest we do a credit to ourselves; and, as I say, I think the cost to the Government will be inconsiderable.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Maryland, I shall not object.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that the proviso in the bill says that the fort property and appurtenant grounds may, with the assent of the Secretary of War, be occupied as a military museum under such rules and regulations as he may in his discretion prescribe. It seems that it is contemplated in this bill that the Secretary is directed to use this as a museum, and it will cease to be used as a fort.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think not; but the gentleman will find that it says that the Secretary of War may assent, and so forth.

Mr. SISSON. I understand that if the Secretary of War should not agree to it, of course it could not be set apart as a museum, but in the event that he did assent to it, when his order was once entered, it then becomes a museum, and could not under the provisions of this bill ever become again a military reservation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish to ask, if the gentleman from Maryland will permit me, if it is not contemplated by the War Department to abandon this as a military post?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is the contemplation of the War Department to abandon it is a military post, and it is contemplated by patriotic societies to collect here all the historic relics they can get which are of interest, and probably erect a museum at some future day.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, with the further consent of the gentleman from Maryland, I want to say that when my attention was drawn to the fact that the Government expected to abandon this post for the stationing of troops—they have had the Coast Artillery there for some time—I suggested, and I think it is something that ought to be done, that as they were seeking an appropriation from Congress to erect a building for an engineers' school, the economic and wise thing would be to go to Fort McHenry and establish the school there. It is close enough to Washington to keep the school in easy touch with the Capital, closer than the artillery school at Fort Monroe, and it would establish something that the people at Baltimore and Maryland would like to have—an important school. It would also preserve this historic fort, which is the scene, I believe, of the writing of the Star-Spangled Banner.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The flag that was floating at twilight and at dawn inspired the hymn.

Mr. SISSON. I want to state that there is a good deal of uncertainty as to what might finally become of the property under the terms of this bill. It seems to leave it within the discretion of the Secretary of War to determine what sort of a museum shall be put up there, and for what purposes the property might be used in the future. In view of the statements made by the gentleman from Texas, do you not think it wise to wait until the Secretary of War or the War Department abandons it for a fort before you undertake to dispose of it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The War Department has practically abandoned it already. Within less than 10 days they have removed all of the troops. We are trying to get an engineers' school there and use the property for some purpose. The property is so close to the city of Baltimore that for the purposes of a fort it is of practically no use.

Mr. SISSON. If you use it for a museum you can not use it for a school.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. The buildings are all there and there would be no additional cost to the Government to establish the school.

Mr. SISSON. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are all interested in Fort McHenry, but we can not hear the conversation on the other side of the House in regard to it.

Mr. SISSON. I want to thank the gentleman from Wyoming for that compliment he has just paid me, because what I say may not amount to much, but I never was accused before of not talking loud enough to be heard. What I want to try to get at in this matter is whether or not under the provisions of this bill, if it passes, and the Secretary of War should set it apart as a museum, it can be used in the future for any other purpose without repealing the act?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say that I just told the gentleman that there were 50 acres of ground there. The engineers' school which we are trying to get located there would take up but a very little space. It would be a magnificent site for it, and it would be absolutely under the War Department.

Mr. SISSON. But under the act you get that ground for a museum. The bill says the "fort property and appurtenant grounds," and that would include all the grounds appurtenant to this fort—entirely too much to be set apart for a museum. If you want any reservation for school purposes the bill ought to provide for it. It should be set apart for museum purposes and for such other purposes as the War Department might desire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it has not been possible to hear all the private conversation that has been going on in the southeast corner of the hall. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LINTHICUM. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much is the cost of this museum to be?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there is no present prospect of a museum there.

Mr. MANN. There is no limit of cost of the museum in this bill, I notice.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Government is not expected to erect any museum there and there is no present prospect of one.

Mr. MANN. But the bill says that it shall be occupied as a military museum, and there is no limit of cost. Does not the gentleman know that that at any time would authorize an appropriation in unlimited amount, year after year, for a museum there?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would say to the gentleman, as I said before, that there is no present prospect or any idea of asking for any appropriation for this fort, but we do feel that a fort which occupies the place in history that Fort McHenry has occupied, when the British forces had taken this city and burned the buildings and were checked at Fort McHenry and North Point, it is entitled to be preserved to all posterity.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of putting in the bill that it is to be occupied as a military museum if there is no intention of doing it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. There is nothing in the bill that says that it shall be occupied as a military museum, but that it may be occupied as a military museum, with the idea that is carried out at Mount Vernon and at other places, where patriotic societies may be able to collect relics pertaining to the War of 1812, and that subsequently they may have a museum, but there is no present prospect whatever of it or any idea of it.

Mr. MANN. If there is no intention of having a museum there I can see no object in passing a bill providing for it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor. I reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] had the floor, and he yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may settle this matter permanently, if my objection is to be dealt with in that way I can stop the discussion by making an objection now, but I had some matters in respect to which I desired to be satisfied.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Maryland to give me three minutes' time to explain this bill, and probably there will not be so many objections to it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland, in order to meet the objection of the gentleman from Illinois and possibly of that of the gentleman from Mississippi, that if he would amend the bill by striking out the proviso he would accomplish everything that is desired.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Or he could say "such other purposes as the War Department may use the property for."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Virginia that I have no objection to the passage of the bill if he will strike out the proviso. In the first place, I do not want to commit the Government to using all of this land for a museum, and I do not want to commit the Government in any way, directly or indirectly, to the establishment of a museum there. I am willing to have it remain as Government property, and am willing that it may be preserved for military purposes and taken care of, but I do not want to commit the Government indirectly to the establishment there of a museum.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland that he cut the Gordian knot by doing that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Virginia agree to strike out all after "department," in line 6?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HAY. No; we want to preserve it for military purposes. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether we want to preserve it for military purposes or not. The purpose of the bill is to prevent it from being turned over to the Interior Department for sale.

Mr. HAY. Or to the Agricultural Department to establish a quarantine station for cattle there.

Mr. MANN. That would leave it read that the grounds shall remain a Government reservation, in the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, in the control of the War Department.

Mr. HAY. That is what it is now.

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to that. If it is for the purpose of committing Congress to the preservation of Fort McHenry, I have no objection to the bill at all.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Maryland to yield me three minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, the people of our State are very much exercised as to what is to be the final disposition of Fort McHenry. It is an historic spot, not only with us, but it is with the Nation. It is the place where at twilight the flag was flying and where it was still flying at dawn, the place where Key was inspired to write his immortal hymn. Our people do not want this historic place taken from the Army or from them. That is all there is in it. It belongs to us. We ought to have there a monument to Key and the Government ought to have that as a reservation. It ought to be occupied as an historic place, where was inspired the grandest national hymn for liberty-loving people that has ever been written. That is all I desire to say about it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I want to explain to the gentleman from Mississippi that the idea of that clause in this bill is not for the purpose of committing the Government to anything. It is for the purpose of allowing the patriotic societies, if they so desire, to get space there for a museum of some kind. It is not worth while for me to talk to this House about the historic importance of Fort McHenry. Everybody ought to realize and know it. It is the place where the British troops were checked in their march through this country, and from that time on were defeated, and we regained our prestige. Had it not been for their repulse at Fort McHenry and North Point there is no telling whether this Union would have kept together, because the New England States were talking very peculiarly at that time. It was not only the question of writing the Star-Spangled Banner, but it was the question of saving the Star-Spangled Banner at that time.

When Francis Scott Key went to get his friend released from that British battleship, when he remained there during the darkness and when the sun went down he saw the Star-Spangled Banner floating he naturally wanted to know whether that flag was still flying at the dawn's early light, and when he beheld that flag he wrote that immortal poem, the Star-Spangled Banner. Now, it is a question whether this Government wants to preserve its historical spots; whether it wants to desecrate those spots or hand them down to posterity. I hope the day may come, Mr. Speaker, when this country will have preserved all its historical spots, when it reveres the memory of its great battles and its wars more than it does the mere getting of money, as now seems to be the ruling passion in all parts of this country. Therefore this bill has been pushed forward by the patriotic societies not for the purpose of having the Government spend any money, because it will not take any money except to cut the grass and keep the building and fortifications in shape, but for the purpose of preserving it and handing it down to future generations as the Fort McHenry where the British were repulsed and where our national honor was upheld.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield? I desire to suggest an amendment which, I think, will satisfy all parties in this matter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that if he is in doubt as to this question about the Government having the right to make it a military museum, I am perfectly willing to leave it in the hands of the War Department and let them handle it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Maryland I think he will get all he wants, because it will be left in the control of the War Department, and the bill then will provide that it shall be kept as a Government reservation, and it in no way commits the Government to a museum, and if these societies desire to use the building for that purpose they could get a permit from the War Department, because it is under its control. I think that is all the gentleman is asking for.

I am in sympathy with it, but I do not want to commit the Government to the establishment of a museum. The Mount Vernon proposition, to which the gentleman referred, he will realize is a proposition where the patriotic ladies of the country made up a subscription to purchase Mount Vernon. It was not done by the Federal Government. As far as the school is concerned, my information is that the War Department has estimated already an appropriation for the present school. I would not care anything about that except I would not like for the bill to commit us to——

Mr. SPARKMAN. What school?

Mr. SISSON. This military school—engineering school.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The last river and harbor bill provided for it.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman from Maryland will agree to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I have no objection, if he will strike out all after the words "War Department," in line 6.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no objection to it if the gentleman thinks it is an advantage.

Mr. SISSON. With the understanding that the bill will be amended, in line 6, by striking out all after the word "Department," I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. There is no one who can give that assurance. Of course, you can have an agreement with the gentleman from Maryland that he will not oppose it. The Chair has ruled, in ordinary practice, that if a man in charge has no objection to an amendment and nobody else objects——

Mr. SISSON. If anybody should object to that statement, I think they ought to object to the agreement, and I assume that the House does not object to the agreement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my distinguished friend from Maryland whether, if the amendment referred by the gentleman from Mississippi be agreed to——

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no objection to it if the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Illinois think it ought to be done.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask whether when the bill goes back to the Senate and the Senate will disagree to the House amendment and ask for a conference, having obtained the bill in a privileged status, in the closing hours of the session they would expect to pass the bill as it now is?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I am trying to get the attention of the gentleman from Maryland first and then of my friend from Virginia. Does the gentleman think that will be satisfactory to the body at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Certainly, I think I can answer that question, but the Senator who introduced the bill is not here, and I could not say; but, so far as I am concerned, it will be perfectly satisfactory, because I am sure the War Department would not have any objection to the use of one of these old buildings for a museum or something of that kind without any expense upon the part of the Government. I can not answer for the conference committee, but I can see no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Just one remark. If that is the understanding on the part of the House, and if this bill goes to conference and the language we have stricken out by the amendment is reinserted, I would consider a confidence game had been played upon me, and I would not have it happen again during this Congress.

The SPEAKER. The House can instruct the conferees. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, to strike out all after the word "Department," in line 6, page 1.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the bill after the word "Department," in line 6, page 1.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will say in response to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not know upon what authority the gentleman could state that a confidence game would be played upon him if the Senate insisted upon disagreeing to the amendment of the House and asked for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I did not state that.

Mr. HAY. That is equivalent to what the gentleman stated. Now, of course, nobody here can speak for what the Senate will do. They may disagree to the House amendment or may agree to it. I do not know what they propose to do; but I do not think that the House can take previous action upon a question of this kind.

Mr. MANN. The House can not control the Senate.

Mr. SISSON. In reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, to which the gentleman from Virginia excepted, I stated that, in view of the statement made here in the presence of all the Members, virtually unanimous consent was obtained for the passage of the bill with the amendment, which simply commits the conferees to the proposition, and if the House was unwilling——

The SPEAKER. Well, at this stage of the proceedings the House can not bind the conferees anyway, and the question is on the third reading of the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "department," page 1, line 6, the following: "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall interfere with the present use of the piers now erected upon said fort ground nor the erection by the Government of any other pier thereupon for Government purposes, with necessary egress and ingress thereto."

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the word "further" be stricken from that amendment, inasmuch as the other amendment provided for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the word "further." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title of the bill will be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. In the amendment I have made it came in after the word "department," as the balance of the clause was stricken out by the previous amendment. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That is the way to do it.

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 22195. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool; and

H. R. 18985. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. SHIVELY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 23351) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the form of a substitute be read in lieu of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909, and of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved June 17, 1910, be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described, upon which entry final proof has not been made, shall have the right to enter public lands, subject to the provisions of this act, contiguous to his former entry, which shall not, together with the original entry, exceed 320 acres.

"SEC. 4. That at the time of making final proofs, as provided in section 2291 of the Revised Statutes, the entryman under this act shall, in addition to the proofs and affidavits required under said section, prove by two credible witnesses that at least one-sixteenth of the area embraced in such entry was continuously cultivated for agricultural crops other than native grasses beginning with the second year of the entry, and that at least one-eighth of the area embraced in the entry was so continuously cultivated beginning with the third year of the entry: Provided, That any qualified person who has heretofore made or hereafter makes additional entry under the provisions of section 3 of this act may be allowed to perfect title to his original entry by showing compliance with the provisions of section 2291 of the Revised Statutes respecting such original entry, and thereafter in making proof upon his additional entry shall be credited with residence maintained upon his original entry from the date of such original entry, but the cultivation required upon entries made under this act must be shown respecting such additional entry, which cultivation, while it may be made upon either the original or additional entry, or upon both entries, must be cultivation in addition to that relied upon and used in making proof upon the original entry; or, if he elects, his original and additional entries may be considered as one, with full credit for residence upon and improvements made under his original entry, in which event the amount of cultivation herein required shall apply to the total area of the combined entry, and proof may be made upon such combined entry whenever it can be shown that the cultivation required by this section has been performed; and to this end the time within which proof must be made upon such combined entry is hereby extended to seven years from the date of the original entry: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to require residence upon the combined entry in excess of the period of residence, as required by section 2291 of the Revised Statutes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves the right to object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement concerning the purposes of the bill.

This bill is amendatory of the two acts providing for enlarged homesteads, one approved February 19, 1909, applying to Colorado, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, and Washington, and the second approved June 17, 1910, applying to Idaho.

Both of these acts relate solely to nonmineral, unreserved, and nonirrigable lands which the Secretary of the Interior may have designated as not susceptible of successful cultivation at a reasonable cost from any known source of water supply—dry-farm lands.

The primary purpose of the bill is to carry out what may be regarded as one of the original purposes of the two acts referred to, namely, to permit entrymen of this class to have the advantage of residence on their original entries. The two acts referred to contain the following provision:

Residence upon and cultivation of the original entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry.

The department construes this to mean that full term of residence must be had after the additional entry is made. The bill will permit the residence on the original entry to be taken into consideration.

Other amendments are adopted to conform to the three-year homestead act of June 6, 1912. Under the existing laws one-eighth of the area embraced in the original entry must have been continuously cultivated in agricultural crops other than native grasses, beginning with the second year, and one-fourth must have been so cultivated, beginning with the third year.

The bill under consideration is more liberal with the homesteader, and provides, in conformity to the three-year homestead act of June 6, 1912, that one-sixteenth, beginning with the second year, and one-eighteenth, beginning with the third, must have been continuously cultivated. Under the proposed act the entryman, in making proof upon his additional entry, shall be credited with residence upon his original entry from the date of such original entry, but the cultivation must be shown respecting such additional entry, and made upon the original or additional entry, or upon both, and must be cultivation in addition to that relied upon and used in making proof upon the original entry. Or, if he elects, his additional and original entries may be considered as one.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. First, may I ask as to the form of the bill? It provides for an amendment of sections 3 and 4 of two different acts.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state to the gentleman that the title should be amended.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of the title. It says "sections 3 and 4 of the act," and names two acts.

Mr. ROBINSON. That amendment was made to conform to the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior in his communication to me as chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill as originally drafted by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] did not embrace the second act, which applies to Idaho, and it is desired, both by the department and those seeking the legislation, that it shall apply to both of those acts.

If the gentleman will permit me just one further statement, I will say that there seems to be a great demand, coming from the States named, for this legislation. I myself have received several hundred letters from persons alleging themselves to be entrymen, and the bill is designed in its primary feature to give the benefit of the original acts to entrymen and at the same time to conform to the enlarged homestead act of June 6, 1912, as I have already stated.

Mr. MANN. With all due respect to the gentlemen who have written to the gentleman from Arkansas, I believe it is a universal rule that there is always a great demand for something that can be gotten for nothing.

Now, let us see whether that is the case here or not. That is what I want to know. You leave out of section 3 of the law the provision in reference to cultivation and residence, on the ground that under the existing law the residence and cultivation of the original entry, in order to be good on the additional entry, must be made after the additional entry is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I judge that the gentleman from Illinois, from the inquiry he makes, does not clearly understand what was intended or done.

Mr. MANN. I have asked a simple question.

Mr. MONDELL. Nothing was left out of section 3 excepting for the purpose of putting it in section 4 in a somewhat different form.

Mr. MANN. You left it out of section 3, did you not?

Mr. MONDELL. We left a paragraph out of section 3 in order to put it in another way in section 4. If we were going to put it in section 4, we had to leave it out of section 3.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; you did not have to leave it out of section 3 at all. You left it out of section 3 for the reason I indicated. Do you deny that?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I deny that.

Mr. MANN. For what reason did you leave it out of section 3?

Mr. MONDELL. Because the department had practically nullified the provision in section 3, and it was on the suggestion of the department that the proviso was added to section 4, containing the provisions which were in section 3 in a modified form.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not deny the statement I made about leaving it out of section 3, and he admits the correctness of the reason I gave for leaving it out of section 3. The question now is, What is the reason for inserting it in section 4, and how is it inserted in section 4? Does the gentleman claim that under this bill when a man makes an original entry and then wishes to take an enlarged homestead he will be required to make any cultivation at all upon the additional land taken?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Then what does this mean:

or, if he elects, his original and additional entries may be considered as one, with full credit for residence upon and improvements made under his original entry, in which event the amount of cultivation herein required shall apply to the total area of the combined entry, and proof may be made upon such combined entry whenever it can be shown that the cultivation required by this section has been performed.

What does that mean if it does not permit a man to use the cultivation upon his original entry in order to get the additional land without any cultivation of the additional land?

Mr. MONDELL. That is what he could have done under the language that is stricken out, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MANN. I know better. I know he could not.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, the language stricken out is this:

And residence upon and cultivation of the original entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Clearly under that language it was unnecessary for the entryman either to live upon or to cultivate the additional entry. The Secretary, in construing that, held that it should be read as though the statement was that residence upon and cultivation of the original entry subsequent to the additional entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the original entry. Even under the Secretary's ruling it was unnecessary either to reside upon or cultivate the additional entry, but sufficient residence and sufficient cultivation must be had subsequent to the additional entry to meet the requirements of the law as to residence and cultivation. Now, in order to meet that ruling and leave the law as nearly as possible as it was originally intended, but still not quite as favorable as it was to the entryman, these words were left out of that section and a proviso added to section 4.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think this would not make it quite as favorable to the entryman as it was originally?

Mr. MONDELL. No; it is not quite as favorable to the entryman.

Mr. MANN. That is sufficient reason for me to object. I do not believe in taking away rights already possessed by homesteaders.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not as favorable as the original legislation would have been, except for the rather extraordinary ruling of the Secretary relative to it.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman would change his statement. The gentleman treats his construction of the law as final, whereas the people who construe the law in the administrative department are the ones who make the construction and not the gentleman from Wyoming after the act is passed.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is scarcely necessary to discuss this construction of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. I think not, because I think it was clearly understood that the construction made by the Secretary was the construction that would be put upon it; and it never was intended that a man who had an original homestead entry should, when the time came for him to make final proof, be permitted to acquire another 160 acres which he never had stepped on and never had done anything with, and gain the title to the additional land without turning his hand over.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Illinois, whose memory is usually excellent, will refresh his memory by referring to the discussion at the time the act was passed, he will find that he himself made that very statement with regard to the act, and that he somewhat objected to the act on that ground.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was persuaded then that the act would be construed otherwise. Now he complains of that construction and insists that I was right then, although he then insisted that I was wrong.

Mr. MONDELL. I never insisted that the gentleman was wrong, because the language is so plain that I do not believe there is anyone under the sun, save the man who decided it, who would have decided it as he did. I will read it again:

And residence upon and cultivation of the original entry shall be deemed as residence upon and cultivation of the additional entry.

That certainly is plain English, but the Secretary decided that that did not mean what it said, although he admitted that his decision created a hardship, and he himself suggested the amendment in the language in which we have it before the House.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is not the object of the law that was passed some time ago, which you are seeking to amend, simply to give those who had made a homestead entry without exercising the right to the 320 acres to take 160 acres additional in order to make the 320 without making proof?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and for this logical reason: Within the past few years men have been taking 160-acre homesteads of the dry lands which are properly enterable under the enlarged-homestead law, but which were not so designated at the time they made the original entry. Subsequently the land was designated as coming under the law—the land they are living upon as well as the additional entry. That being true, there is no reason why the man who located two or three years ago should be denied the right which the man now gets by making entry on the land.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will yield, I suggest that this bill puts the man who heretofore filed on the location on the same basis as the man who now files.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; if the land is enlarged-homestead land.

Mr. RAKER. And you can not get 320 acres unless it is that kind of land.

Mr. MANN. He can get it if he works it, but you want to let him get it without doing a stroke of work on it. He can get it now if he wants to cultivate it.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the Secretary's ruling it is not necessary for the man to cultivate the additional land or reside upon it. The Secretary makes no such ruling as the gentleman from Illinois claims.

Mr. MANN. He is required to cultivate the additional land on the original entry, which, in this bill, you propose to cut in two.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not mean that. He does not have to cultivate it under the Secretary's ruling any more than he is required to under this bill. The only change this makes under the Secretary's ruling is this: If this act should pass, he would not be required to reside upon his entry after he took the additional land only long enough to complete his residence from the date of the original entry.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is it not a fact in practice that no lands can be entered under the 320-acre homestead law until they have been designated by the Secretary as being lands incapable of irrigation?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true.

Mr. LAFFERTY. And also lands of a semiarid nature?

Mr. MONDELL. And lands that do not contain merchantable timber.

Mr. LAFFERTY. And do we not, in order to get applications started, take a year or two to get them through, and the man files on the land expecting to enlarge his homestead entry at such time as the lands are designated as subject to the law?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it often occurs that a man settles on dry lands in anticipation of their being designated under the enlarged-homestead law.

Mr. MANN. May I ask whether under the existing law they are compelled to have under cultivation one-eighth of the area embraced in the entry for agricultural crops other than grasses beginning the second year of the entry?

Mr. MONDELL. The language of this statute is exactly the language of the three-year homestead bill that we passed, so that it does not change that.

Mr. MANN. It changes these sections.

Mr. MONDELL. We wrote the same provisions in here because it is already the law. The three-year homestead law fixes the period of residence, and we followed that law.

Mr. MANN. This has nothing to do with the period of residence. I am talking about the cultivation.

Mr. MONDELL. That was fixed in the law.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that the three-year homestead law changes these sections.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say that the three-year law did change them exactly as they are here. The three-year law provided specifically for the amount of cultivation, including the enlarged homestead, and fixed the area exactly as we fix it in this bill.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield again?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If a man should avail himself of the provisions of this bill to enlarge his homestead to 320 acres, would not he be required to double the amount of cultivation before he could prove up?

Mr. MANN. He would not be required to double anything if he was cultivating under the original law one-eighth, as the law requires, of the original entry. Under this bill he would be permitted to take the additional 160 acres without cultivating an additional acre or an additional piece of ground.

Mr. MONDELL. He must cultivate, as the gentleman from Illinois knows, one-sixteenth of the area of the entry, whatever it is, and later, one-eighth of the area, whatever it is, and therefore if he increases the area he would have to increase the acreage of cultivation unless he was already cultivating an amount which was equal to one-eighth and the one-sixteenth of 320 acres.

Mr. MANN. This law applies to entries already made, and that law requires, beginning the second year, that he must have one-eighth under cultivation. The gentleman now proposes to reduce that to one-sixteenth.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not want to state what is not true, I know, and if the gentleman will remember—and I am sorry I have not a copy of the three-year homestead law here——

Mr. MANN. But assuming that it was taken by the homestead law, that did not apply to this additional 160 acres——

Mr. MONDELL. It did apply to it in terms.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will ever permit me to make a statement without interrupting until I get through, we will get along better—did not apply to this 160 acres, under the provisions of this act. The gentleman now proposes to make the cultivation of that one-eighth already made a sufficient excuse for a man to take the additional 160 acres, and provide that in cultivation, as in the homestead law, one-sixteenth of the entire amount, which is no more than one-eighth of the original 160 acres, shall be sufficient, so that the purpose of this bill is to grant an additional 160 acres to every homesteader in this region who has not already acquired 320 acres without any additional cultivation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, I will try and state again briefly just what this law does, because I think the gentleman has not the matter clearly in his mind. The only change this makes in the present law is this: That under the present law as interpreted by the department a man making an additional entry can not receive credit for residence and cultivation on his original entry prior to his taking the additional entry, and this bill provides that he may have credit for such residence and cultivation on his original entry both prior and subsequent to the additional entry, but it does not reduce the amount of land that he must cultivate. It does change the period during which, under certain conditions, cultivation would have to be had. In other words, if this bill were not passed, and a man had for two years cultivated enough of a 160-acre homestead to entitle him to a 320-acre homestead, all he would be required to cultivate on a 320-acre homestead, he would get the credit for it, whereas under the present interpretation of the law the cutivation that applies to the additional entry must be for a period subsequent to the taking of the additional entry. That is the only difference.

Mr. FRENCH. And the bill would practically restore the original interpretation of the present law.

Mr. MONDELL. As we understood it—as the committee understood it—at the time, it does not perfectly restore that condition, however, for this reason: Should the entryman make proof on his original entry separate from his additional entry, it does not give him credit for the cultivation he may have had on the original entry, and in that respect it is not as favorable to the entryman, as we understood the bill to be as it originally passed. But if he sees fit to combine his two entries, then it leaves him practically in the position we understood he was in when we passed the other bill. It does not relieve him from any cultivation that he would now be required to make. It does relieve him in some cases from the necessity of a certain amount of cultivation subsequent to the time he takes his additional entry.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman deny that this would give a man there now having a homestead entry, of which he has cultivated 10 or 15 acres, the right to an additional 160 acres without compelling him to do anything more?

Mr. MONDELL. I deny that he could get it without cultivating first a one-sixteenth and then a one-eighth of the entire area.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Not unless he desires to answer the question.

Mr. MONDELL. If he has cultivated a sufficient amount of his original entry to meet the requirements of the law as to the entire 320 acres, that would be true.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That would be 40 acres.

Mr. MANN. No; if he has cultivated 20 acres of his original 160 acres and is ready to take up the homestead under this bill, would he not be entitled to increase it 160 acres more?

Mr. MONDELL. No; because that would not be an eighth of 320 acres.

Mr. MANN. But it does not require an eighth of the entry, whatever it is.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; of final cultivation. It requires an eighth. That would be 40 acres.

Mr. MANN. Forty acres.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to call his attention to the language of the bill that we passed, known as the three-year homestead law:

Provided further, That the entryman shall, in order to comply with the requirements of cultivation herein provided for, cultivate not less than one-sixteenth of the area of his entry, beginning with the second year of the entry, and not less than one-eighth, beginning with the third year of the entry, and until final proof, except that in the case of entries under section 6 of the enlarged homestead law double the area of cultivation herein provided shall be required, but the Secretary of the Interior may, upon a satisfactory showing, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, reduce the required area of cultivation.

Mr. MANN. What is the point the gentleman is making?

Mr. RAKER. The law already provides, the law which we passed, the same area of cultivation that is provided for in this bill, one-sixteenth and one-eighth.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that is not the gist of this bill.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman permit me to answer his question?

Mr. MANN. The purpose of this bill is in the new part, and the new part absolutely eliminates in practice what the gentleman has read.

Mr. LAFFERTY. As I understand it, the gentleman from Illinois figures that under certain circumstances the man who now has a homestead entry might under this bill be permitted on proving up on it to get 160 acres more without doing anything in addition to what he had already done, and it is true that if the present homestead entryman in a dry area had 40 acres cultivated he could add, at the time he made final proof, another 160 acres without doing anything additional in the way of residence or cultivation; but I want to ask the gentleman why that is not fair and right. If a man went there at a time when he could not avail himself of the 320-acre homestead law, in the dry region, and has cultivated an eighth of 320 acres and the law has since been liberalized and there is a vacant 160 acres adjoining his, why should he not have the same right that other people making those entries now have, and why should he not have 320 the same as an entryman now going out into this country? Only in rare instances would the exception which the gentleman from Illinois has suggested apply.

Mr. MANN. This will apply to a great many homestead entries, will it not—quite a few?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Very few.

Mr. MANN. Quite a few where people have already gone on the land under the theory it was not subject to the 320 and have been satisfied with the 160 acres.

Mr. LAFFERTY. No.

Mr. MANN. Then, if there is no demand, why should you have the bill?

Mr. LAFFERTY. The demand comes from many others.

Mr. MONDELL. The rather insistent demand now and the demand which I think we ought to give heed to is largely coming from men who understood that they could prove up on their combined entries and get title, and who under the new ruling, having made their additional entry quite recently, would be required to live on their land three years before they could make final proof.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that will not kill them.

Mr. MONDELL. It affects them very seriously. A good many of such men are affected seriously and will need relief, and the department thinks it ought to be afforded.

Mr. MANN. One would suppose from hearing gentlemen from the so-called public-land States speak on the floor that the only object of men in getting a homestead was to get away from it, whereas plenty of them got homesteads to live upon them.

Mr. MONDELL. A man frequently proves up his homestead as a basis of credit. It is not for the purpose of moving but——

Mr. MANN. What basis of credit would it be to present a man 160 acres if he has already 160 acres that is not worth anything?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, 320 acres of land, even if it is not very good land, is better than 160 acres, which is not large enough in area, if the land is fairly good land, to take care of the man.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to state I have gone into this subject with reference to Oregon and we have in one county over 4,000,000 acres—that is Harney County—of vacant unreserved lands subject to homestead, and we are anxious for people to come and take it, but they do not do it; and it is in reference to such lands that we need this law.

Mr. MANN. Gentlemen often state on the floor that because all the land in the United States has not been occupied that therefore it is not worth anything, and yet you can go around the city of Washington, the Capital of the country, in any direction and find land that is not under cultivation.

Mr. LAFFERTY. We have over 17,000,000 acres in Oregon, over one-fourth of the State, vacant, unreserved, and open to all comers.

Mr. MANN. They have taken up in the last year one-fourth as much as in the last 20 years.

Mr. LAFFERTY. They did not come to Oregon.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? I would like to get back to the first chapter of Genesis upon this proposition.

Mr. MANN. Nobody on that side of the House will be familiar with what you are going to talk about. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The fact is I do not think my friend MONDELL has put this case before the House just as it is and as it should address itself to your minds. In the first place the addition of 160 acres, the enlarged-homestead act, was passed with a view of allowing a cultivation of 160 acres one year and 160 acres the other year, allowing the cultivation of 160 acres that would otherwise lie fallow. Now, then, that view was taken by the Secretary and it was compromised by reason of the bill that I put in, which required not a cultivation at all of the additional 160 acres or the original 160 acres unless the settler himself concluded it was the best thing for him to do, and he after all was the best judge of that. Now, we provide in my bill that he would put in catch basins, he would dig wells, and put other improvements upon the land in lieu of the cultivation, or, in other words, the plowing up of this land.

Now, I have in my district I think as much, possibly more than any other Member here, of this arid land outside of the district of the gentleman from Wyoming. Of course his land is not worth anything anyhow, and dry farming or any other kind of farming would not do any good up there in Wyoming, but in our section of the country we run across this proposition, that if you plow up this land and undertake to put it in cultivation and you do not pursue that Campbell system of dry cultivation, cultivating the soil every month throughout the year, then you are going to lose all the profits that might come from the land, and so, therefore, there was a compromise in that the land should not be plowed up where the grass was growing unless the settler concluded it was the best thing for him to do, because I know from my own experience that the original grass will not grow for 20 years upon the land when it is once plowed up. So, therefore, the settler under this bill—I think this is an infamous bill in my judgment—would be required to put it in cultivation. Cultivation means plowing up of the soil, and unless you follow it up by the Campbell system of dry farming then you are going to lose the entire usufruct of the land, because the grass will not grow upon that land for 20 years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill (S. 6354) in relation to Fort McHenry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONFEDERATE CEMETERY AT LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 24365) providing for the taking over by the United States Government of the Confederate cemetery at Little Rock, Ark.

The bill was read.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY] introduced this bill, and also placed it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar after it had been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. JACOWAY, I am informed, is ill and can not be here to-day. I should like to ask unanimous consent that this bill remain on the calendar and be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to pass this bill without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14053) to increase the pensions of Indian War survivors in certain cases.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the rate of pension to survivors of the various Indian wars who are now on the pension roll or who may hereafter be placed thereon under the acts of July 27, 1892, June 27, 1902, and May 30, 1908, shall be $12 per month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SISSON). Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if anybody here represents the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will say, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois, that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] is ill and can not be here. I would like to have this bill passed over, therefore, without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. I would like very much to pass the bill, while reserving the right to object, but I do not believe that the bill ought to be passed fixing the rate of $12 per month. These survivors of the Indian wars are all survivors of wars prior to 1860. We have granted to Mexican War soldiers $30 a month. I do not believe, if we are to amend the law and change it, that it comports with the dignity of the Republic to provide only $12 a month for these old veterans.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say this: I served four years on the Committee on Pensions, and these survivors were granted $8 a month under the law. It has always been the rule of the committee and the rule of the House that any one of these Indian war survivors getting $8 a month is increased by special act to $16 per month without objection. They were all considered in cases that the committee and the House always passed.

Mr. MANN. Now, I will explain a complication about the bill, if I may, in just a moment. There are three acts of Congress referred to here, putting survivors of Indians wars upon the pension roll at $8 a month in each case. That puts the survivors of Indian wars who served for 30 days, and also their widows, on the roll at $8 per month. They are under the same law, so that the rate fixed in this bill, if enacted into law, would apply both to the survivors of the wars and their widows. I think the survivors ought to have the same rate, or very close to it, that is now granted to Mexican War veterans. This goes back and covers some of the Texas Rangers in the fifties.

If you are going to increase the pensions of these few men, now away on in years, they ought to be increased to a reasonable amount. Whether or not the widow ought to have her pension increased to $30 a month is another question. The widows probably ought not to be increased beyond the amount paid to the widows of Mexican War soldiers.

Mr. HAY. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not a fact—as I believe it is—that when a man is granted a pension by special act the Committees on Pensions refuse to increase the amount, and if one of these survivors has been granted a pension by special act at the rate of $8 a month, this bill would not do him any good?

Mr. MANN. This would not do him any good; but under the language of this bill, if an Indian war survivor had obtained a special act for $16 a month——

Mr. HAY. Well, for $8 a month——

Mr. MANN (continuing). This bill would reduce him to $12, because there is not inserted here the usual provision that it shall not operate as a reduction in any case.

Mr. HAY. I know of one case where a man obtained a pension for service in one of these Indian wars under a special act.

Mr. MANN. He probably was not entitled.

Mr. HAY. He got it by special act, and the committee declined to consider any bill for an increase.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will offer an amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest, in connection with what the gentleman from Illinois has said, that he is entirely right. Twelve dollars a month is too small an amount for the surviving soldiers of those old Florida and other Indian wars.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that if consent is given to the consideration of this bill, I have an amendment prepared to strike out "$12" and insert "$30"; and if that comes up I am going to offer the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I shall certainly support that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman proposes to do what?

Mr. MANN. To make the pension $30 a month instead of $12.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Widows as well as veterans?

Mr. MANN. That feature will probably be corrected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think we ought to legislate on that theory.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this bill is not correct, it ought to go over. I am not sure that it should not be corrected. But if we are to start the precedent of pensioning widows of wars at $30 a month, the House should have full knowledge of it. I suggest that the bill be passed over.

Mr. SPARKMAN. This does not seem to provide for pensioning widows at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does, it is stated, under the wording of the act.

Mr. MANN. It does provide for the widows.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the consideration of this bill had better be deferred. There will be another day for its consideration.

Mr. MANN. I say it applies to widows. The language is "survivors." Maybe it would not apply under the original act. The original act specifically applied to widows. This is "survivors of the Indian wars." Perhaps that would not apply to the widows.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the intention of it was to have it apply only to the surviving soldiers of those wars.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That is my understanding about it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say that I have introduced a bill increasing the amount to $24.

Mr. MANN. Why not amend the bill, and say "surviving soldiers" instead of "survivors," at $30 a month? That would cover it.

Mr. WARBURTON. That is good.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in line 4, the word "survivors" and insert in lieu thereof the words "surviving soldiers."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 4, by striking out the word "survivors" and inserting the words "surviving soldiers."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out, in line 9, the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by striking out "twelve" and inserting "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the title of the bill be amended.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SPARKMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 7195) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Great Northern Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the needs of navigation, to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War, either in the county of McKenzie or Williams, in the State of North Dakota, or the county of Dawson or Valley, in the State of Montana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly hereby reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I notice that this bill provides that the location of this bridge shall be selected by the company and approved by the Secretary of War. The general bridge act provides that the company shall submit a map, and so forth, of its proposed location, and that before the bridge can be built it must be approved by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. It does not seem to me desirable to depart from the requirement that it shall receive the approval both of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War. I will ask the gentlemen interested in the bill whether they are willing to strike out that provision.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I reported the bill, but I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this proposes to permit the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Montana and North Dakota. The reason why this bill differs from the ordinary form, as the committee are informed, is that the banks of the river are very high and there was some difficulty in finding the right sort of location along the river. So this sort of latitude was given for the location of the bridge by the company, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. If the gentleman cares to add the Chief of Engineers, I have no objection.

Mr. MANN. Why not strike out the words "to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War"?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There will be no objection to that. That leaves it subject to the provisions of the bridge act.

Mr. MANN. That would leave sufficient latitude without making any change in the usual form.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly; there is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, page 1, lines 8 and 9, by striking out the words "to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, lines 8 and 9, by striking out the words "to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, MOLINE, ILL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25073) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Moline, Ill., and Bettendorf, Iowa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Moline-Bettendorf Bridge Co., an Illinois corporation, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, from a point east of Twenty-third Street, in the city of Moline, in the county of Rock Island and State of Illinois, to the town of Bettendorf, Iowa: Provided, That the bridge shall be built in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided further, That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the approval of the act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask the gentleman to what use this bridge is to be put. I see it is to be constructed by a bridge company, and the words "a railroad and wagon" are stricken out.

Mr. COVINGTON. At the time this bill was before the committee the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ESCH] looked into the matter and reported upon it. I presume it is to be an ordinary bridge, to be used for the traffic between one county and another. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINNEY] is the author of the bill, and can no doubt state precisely what use is to be made of the bridge.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I will say in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin that after being drawn in its original form the bill was changed by certain amendments proposed by the committee, which make it comply with the general bridge bill for bridges over navigable streams. The purpose is to have a wagon bridge and also a railroad bridge. It is to serve the purposes of those two communities. The bridge company is not a foreign company at all, but is composed of citizens of the two communities.

Mr. COOPER. Is the company to charge tolls?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. They would have a right to do so under the general law.

Mr. McKINNEY. The project would not pay at all if they did not.

Mr. COVINGTON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKINNEY] will permit me, I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the general bridge act in existence to-day provides ample safeguards, even in the matter of fixing tolls.

Mr. COOPER. Moline is a city. Is Bettendorf the name of a private individual?

Mr. McKINNEY. It is the name of a place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out the words "a railroad and wagon."

Mr. MANN. The word "a" should not be stricken out. That should remain in the bill, and therefore should be eliminated from the amendment proposing to strike out.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the modification suggested by the gentleman from Illinois will be agreed to. The question is on the amendment as modified.

There was no objection. The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 9 and 10, strike out in line 9, after word "Iowa," the words "Provided, That the bridge shall be built."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after the word "six," in line 2, strike out the words: "Provided further, That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within four years from the approval of the act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment to the title.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended to read: "To authorize the Moline-Bettendorf Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between Moline, Ill., and Bettendorf, Iowa."

On motion of Mr. COVINGTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT PORT BOLIVAR, TEX.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 22199) to establish a subport of entry and delivery at Port Bolivar, in the State of Texas.

Mr. GREGG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute be read in lieu of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute be read in lieu of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limits of the port of entry of Galveston, Tex., be, and the same are hereby, extended to include Port Bolivar, in that State.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend the limits of the port of entry of Galveston, Tex., to include Port Bolivar, in that State."

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITHIN INDIAN, MILITARY, AND NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25738) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange lands for school sections within an Indian, military, or national forest or other reservation, and for other purposes.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold that objection. I would like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think in view of the fact that this bill and one like it has been on the calendar for three months, and the gentleman has been heard upon it frequently, and the fact that we have a large calendar to-day to get through with, I must object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman adhere to his objection?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on this bill that the gentleman objects to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I will say to the gentleman that I will be glad to cooperate with him and get unanimous consent for him to address the House for 10 minutes or 20 minutes at any other time, but there is a long list of bills yet to be disposed of, and I feel constrained to object.

TERMS OF COURT AT TRENTON, N. J.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4838) to amend section 96 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 96 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 96. The State of New Jersey shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of New Jersey. Terms of the district court shall be held at Trenton on the third Tuesdays in January, April, and September. At each term of the district court it shall be lawful for the judge holding such term, on consent of both parties or on application therefor and good cause shown by either party to any civil cause set for trial or hearing at said term, to order such cause to be held or tried at the city of Newark, in said district, upon the day set for that purpose by said judge: Provided, That such application shall be made to said judge, either in vacation or term time, at least one week before the date set for trial of said cause and on at least five days' notice to the opposite party or his or her attorney; and writs of subpœna to compel the attendance of witnesses at said city of Newark may issue, and jurors summoned to attend said term may be ordered by said judge to be in attendance upon said court in the city of Newark."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that heretofore I have not objected to any bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I have tried to give consideration to other Members of this House. The bill that was just objected to—I hate to say it, but I can not help but believe that it was because of some personal matter. If there is anyone from the West wants to object, let him do it. We will then know who it is, and can then obtain his reasons for such objections and it may be obviated by proper amendment. That bill has been gone into by the Public Lands Committee on two public hearings, testimony was taken and published, parties interested were heard and given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from California is not discussing anything before the House.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, before the Chair rules, that if the gentleman intends to drive all the rest of the bills from the calendar to-day he can do so. I have sat here patiently for two months——

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The Chair will state to the gentleman from California that no Member is obliged to give his reasons for objecting to any bill. It may be for personal pique; it may be for the public interest; it may be for one thing or it may be for another; but he does not have to state his reasons.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to transgress the rules, but I believe that I ought to be able to state to the House the further fact——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STATUS OF ARMY OFFICERS IN AVIATION SERVICE, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17256) to fix the status of officers in the Army detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage and approval of this act the pay and allowances as are now or may be hereafter fixed by law for officers of the Regular Army shall be doubled for such officers as are now or may be hereafter detailed by the Secretary of War on aviation duty: Provided, That this increase of pay and allowances shall be given to such officers only as are actual flyers of heavier-than-air craft, and while so detailed, as provided in section 1: Provided further, That no more than 30 officers shall be detailed to the aviation service.

SEC. 2. That paragraph 2 of section 26 of an act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States," shall not limit the tour of detail to aviation duty of officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to increase the total number of officers now in the Regular Army.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether he considers it necessary in order to provide sufficient officers for purposes of aviation to double both the pay and the allowance?

Mr. HAY. I do. I do not know of any branch of the military service which is more important than military aviation.

Mr. MANN. I have been trying to urge that idea upon the House for some years, and I am glad the gentleman has come to agree with me.

Mr. HAY. I can assure the gentleman that it has been urged successfully upon me, and I have given this matter a great deal of consideration. I am satisfied that if aviation progresses in the same way for the next five years that it has done in the last five years a great many problems of war which now confront us will be solved, and solved in the interest of peace. Therefore, I am anxious, so far as I can, to do all that is possible for that service in this country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. HAY. As to the compensation of these gentlemen who are engaged in it, I will state that they are unable to obtain accident insurance as well as life insurance. They take their lives in their hands every time they go up into the air. If anything happens to the engine of the machine they are liable to be killed instantly. These men, it is true, are volunteers. The department does not compel anyone to engage in this service. They are volunteers, and in justice to their families—and some of them are married and others have people dependent upon them—I think they should receive extra compensation. They should not engage in this work unless they receive extra compensation. I do not believe that the compensation provided in this bill is more than it ought to be.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Under the law as it exists now is there any bounty or pension paid to the widows and dependent children of officers who are killed by accidents in these aeroplanes?

Mr. HAY. Under the law the widow and dependent children of any officer who dies in the discharge of his duty are entitled to a pension, but it is small.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How much?

Mr. HAY. I think the widow of a captain gets $30 a month.

Mr. MANN. It depends upon the rank.

Mr. HAY. And a major $40. None of them gets over $50 a month. I think a brigadier general's widow gets only $50 a month.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And that same pension goes to the widows of men who are killed, without regard to the manner in which they meet their death?

Mr. HAY. Yes; killed in the line of duty.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is only when killed in line of duty that they are entitled to a pension?

Mr. HAY. Only when killed in line of duty. If they are out of the service and they are killed by accident when they are not performing military duty, as I understand it, they are not entitled to a pension.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman considered the propriety of limiting the operation of this law to five years? I agree with the gentleman that at this time there are conditions which I think appeal to everyone, but the feeling is that within a few years the science of aviation will be a comparatively safe one, when we realize the great advance that has been made for it in the last few years; and if it is developed to a point where it becomes safe, I doubt whether there should be this distinction. It occurred to me that perhaps if this law were enacted to last during a period of, say, five years, it would be wise. If in that time the improvements were such as to make the science safe, then this extra compensation should not be given.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to putting a limitation upon the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make that suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to that, and I will offer it as an amendment, if the gentleman will suggest it.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, what is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HAY. To limit the provisions of the bill to five years.

Mr. TILSON. So that each officer who goes into it will understand that at the end of that period——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; that during the next five years this law shall apply.

Mr. HAY. Yes; and if, as the gentleman seems to think, aviation becomes much safer, then it will not apply after that time.

Mr. TILSON. And we all hope it will become much safer.

Mr. HAY. It will not be necessary then to pay them as much, and the law can be extended if it does not become any safer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understand the chairman of the committee desires to offer an amendment limiting the time, and after that I desire to offer some amendments.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill in line 3, after the word "that," by inserting the words "for five years."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 3, by inserting after the word "that" the words "for five years."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Army," page 1, line 5, insert "Navy and Marine Corps."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. What is the objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the reason for it? It is limited to five years—I will withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "War," page 1, line 7, insert the words "or the Secretary of the Navy."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after the word "officers," insert the words "of each service."

Mr. MANN. Just a moment. Will that amendment include 30 for the Army, 30 for the Navy, and 30 for the Marine Corps?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is the purpose.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman wish to have 60 in the Navy?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I will say at the present there are no officers of the Marine Corps detailed to aviation work, and the developments of the future may be such that it may be thought advisable to put that branch of the service on the Marine Corps.

Mr. MANN. I think it will be time enough to wait some time before we provide 30 officers for that service.

Mr. HAY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he make it 30 officers for the Army and Navy.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is agreeable, as long as I get the Marine Corps in.

Mr. MANN. The Marine Corps would be included in the term "Navy."

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Then, change the amendent so it will say "not more than 30 officers of the Army and 30 officers of the Navy and Marine Corps."

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "officers," line 2, page 2, the words "of the Army and 30 officers of the Navy."

Mr. HAY. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts provides there can be 30 officers of the Navy and Marine Corps combined, and not of each.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is the idea.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 11, after the word "Army," add the words "Navy or Marine Corps."

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I will say that provision is for the purpose of providing there shall be no increase of the officers in the service by reason of aviation.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I suggest an amendment, page 2, line 1, to strike out the words "in section 1" and insert the word "herein."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "in section 1" and insert the word "herein."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to read as follows: "To fix the status of officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service."

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

During the consideration of the above bill,

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITHIN FOREST RESERVATIONS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. I began a statement which I do not like to leave uncompleted.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from California feel that he can relieve his mind in two minutes?

Mr. RAKER. I think I can get relief by continuing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes, so as to be sure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] be allowed to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the original bill, H. R. 25738, that was objected to a few moments ago, is a copy with two important amendments upon it of a bill which was considered by the Committee on the Public Lands, as I stated, and after public hearings and after due consideration by the committee at least at three sessions the bill was favorably reported, and when this bill 25738 was introduced it was again considered by the Committee on the Public Lands and reported favorably by that committee, and unanimously at that.

The same bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator PERKINS, hearing was had before the Committee on Public Lands, and that committee unanimously reported the bill with slight amendments, which we agreed to.

The California delegation, composed of Senators and Members of the House, met in conference upon the bill and agreed upon it. They informed me that there was no objection to this bill, because it relates to over 500,000 acres of land in California, where the people have been in doubt as to their titles from two to twenty-five years. The State is losing in taxes by virtue of the nonsettlement of the matter. It has gone to the Attorney General of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and the legal officers, both Mr. Clemens and Mr. Cobb. It has gone before the attorney general of the State of California and the surveyor general, and they were on here for at least six weeks in regard to it. This matter was gone into by the Department of the Interior, the State surveyor general, and the attorney general of California last year; the governor of the State of California made it a part of the call for the special extra session of the legislature, which unanimously passed the legislation and asked that it be carried out by Congress.

Now if there is any reason for it, and I ask the gentleman to state what his reason is, if the delegation from California, both Senators and Members of the House and Members of the West are in favor of it, there can be no damage done to anybody. It is necessary for the State of California to settle the land titles and should become a law. It is for the interest of the State, and it seems to me there ought to be some valid reason why such necessary legislation should not be enacted. The entire State is interested in the matter. Over 500,000 acres of land, as I have stated, is affected by the legislation. No title can be had until legislation is provided by Congress, as the attorney general for the State of California says, and also the surveyor general, by this appropriate legislation. I have been persistent in the matter. I have given every consideration to it that could be given, and I have hoped and asked the gentleman to withdraw his objection, and that the bill might be passed, the Senate Committee on Public Lands having gone into it, the House Committee on the Public Lands having gone into it, and a thorough investigation having been made, it ought to be permitted to be heard by the House. It is only giving us an opportunity to straighten the title, to clear up a condition that has been in existence for 30 years, and is now acute. I feel, in justice to myself and in justice to the gentleman's objection to the bill, that I ought to explain this to the House, and I believe if the gentleman understood the features of the bill, the reason for it and the matters that have been heard, he would offer no objection to the bill being considered by the House at the present time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I did not understand the bill I should not have objected.

COMPILATION OF REVOLUTIONARY WAR RECORDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 271) to authorize the collection of the military and naval records of the Revolutionary War with a view to their publication.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered military records of the Revolutionary War, including all troops acting under State authority, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered naval records of the Revolutionary War.

SEC. 2. That all such records in the possession or custody of any official of the United States shall be transferred, the military records to the War Department and the naval records to the Navy Department.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated for the purposes of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $50,000 for the War Department and $10,000 for the Navy Department: Provided further, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of any such records that may be discovered either in the hands of private owners or in public depositories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman will merely reserve the right and not object. The matter of gathering these records of the Revolutionary War has, in the judgment of a great many people and my own judgment, been too long delayed. There has been legislation previous to this time upon the subject, but not the sufficient authority to enable the work to be done. Scattered through the original 13 States, the most of them in State departments and historical societies and other places, are a great many records of our first war. It seems to me that they ought to be gathered together and placed as a matter of record in the department here. This bill has passed the Senate, passed the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, has the approval of patriotic organizations of the country who are interested in the preservation of these records. The Congress has authorized the gathering of records of practically every other war in which our people have been engaged. They have been gathered, and it seems to me that this bill ought to pass, and I hope that the gentleman will not object to its consideration.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I am very heartily in favor of gathering together the military and naval records of the Revolutionary War. This bill provides for that and then appropriates a certain sum of money out of the Treasury. Does the gentleman anticipate that the money herein appropriated is sufficient to do the work required, or is this only a preliminary appropriation with no limit of cost?

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman confesses that he has no opinion upon that subject but is taking the action of the committee which investigated the matter and that of the department. I believe the department made no recommendation as to the amount of the appropriation, but I am sure I am expressing the opinion——

Mr. MANN. Then I can give the gentleman a little information upon the subject. The original bill carried $10,000, and the bill as reported carries only $7,000 for this work in the Navy Department. The Secretary of the Navy stated:

It is estimated that for selection, copying, compiling, and preparing the two volumes for the printer the cost would be $20,000, with an additional $10,000 for printing the first 1,000 of the two.

That is $20,000 for preparation.

Mr. HAY. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this bill does not propose to compile anything for the purpose of being printed, but it proposes to collect this material and place the material in this department. I will state to the gentleman that those interested in the bill who appeared before the committee stated that the sum which the House committee recommended to be appropriated would be sufficient; but if it is not sufficient I submit to the gentleman that it would be sufficient for a year or two.

Mr. MANN. Now, I will submit to the gentleman this proposition and see if he will not agree to it: In the first place, the departments have both estimated that it will cost more to do this work than the amount appropriated, even if they do not buy any of these records.

Mr. HAY. There is no authority given them to buy.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but there is. The authority to collect records is authority to buy them. The bill provides:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered military records of the Revolutionary War.

Now, if you will put a limitation of cost in, so that the Secretary will not purchase the records which somebody wants to sell——

Mr. PAGE. The last proviso of the bill says:

That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of any such records that may be discovered either in the hands of private owners or in public depositories.

Mr. MANN. Well, there may be some other places.

Mr. HAY. I do not know where they could be.

Mr. PAGE. Could the gentleman suggest some other place?

Mr. MANN. Yes. There are plenty of other places besides the hands of private owners and public depositories. They might belong to a municipality or to a State. That would not necessarily be in a public depository.

Mr. PAGE. Does not the gentleman think that if they belong to the States the States would very gladly cooperate with the National Government, without selling them, or without cost?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they would or not. It seems to me there ought to be some limitation of cost inserted here.

Mr. HAY. What limitation of cost would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection, if the gentleman favoring the proposition will mention a sum which he thinks will cover the cost.

Mr. HAY. The House committee reduced the appropriation, as the gentleman sees.

Mr. MANN. Well, I see, and thereby I was led to believe that this was not intended as a limitation upon the cost.

Mr. HAY. Well, I think so. The gentlemen who appeared before us were gentlemen belonging, one of them, to the Society of the Cincinnati, and others to other patriotic societies; and we gathered from them that the amount recommended to be appropriated by the House committee would be sufficient. But if the gentleman thinks that it is necessary to put a limitation upon it, and to make that limitation the sum carried in the bill, I shall be very glad to accept it.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia. These records are scattered, and a good many of them are liable to perish. Of course, the gentleman recognizes the fact that the object of this bill is to preserve those records. Now, to protect us against extravagance, it might be well to impose a limitation, but I trust the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not object to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have stated that I was very heartily in favor of the proposition in the bill. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself and various others have been around here long enough to know that when you are dealing with somebody with an unlimited appropriation you do not always meet with that same kind of feeling that you do when there is a limitation upon the expenditure.

Mr. PAGE. We are waiting upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for a suggestion as to the limitation.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that these words be inserted on page 1, line 4, after the word "publication": "within the limits of the appropriation herein provided."

Mr. PAGE. That is acceptable, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CANNON. After all is said and done, why not strike out all the appropriation and be content, if the act must pass, with perfecting the act, and let the appropriations for this purpose be made as they are for other branches of the public service?

Mr. MANN. That would be no limitation upon the amount that could be expended.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am not much in favor of the bill. I recollect very well—to show how these ancient records that our fathers did not gather together are preserved—it is, I believe, 121 years ago, is it not, that the records of the First Census were gathered?

Mr. PAGE. Yes; but the gentleman will recollect that these records are already gathered. This is not intended to gather records. It is to get records that are already in the hands of certain people.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that records are accumulating very fast. Many years ago the Committee on Appropriations reported a provision to destroy, as old junk, the census returns, the returns of the First Census, and, perhaps, some other returns—all the papers connected with those returns. People rose up all over the country against it. We found out, upon inquiry, according to my recollection, that from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars had to be paid as rent for the building in which these records were stored, and we found a salary roll of from $12,000 to $15,000, if my recollection serves me, required to take care of those returns. But there was a unanimous or a very well concerted effort that defeated that legislation. When we came to get the remonstrances against it, they seemed to arise principally from the great desire of people to trace descent from those people who lived when the First Census was taken.

Those returns are there yet and are still increasing. Unless the legislation has escaped my attention, every paper of every kind of the 90,000,000 of people in the United States—all the returns—are all to be kept, so that it is the greatest lot of old junk, so far as the census is concerned, that serves no useful purpose in the world. I do not know—I have great respect for those who want to trace their descent from the people who served in the Revolution; but, after all, what other object is there in this?

Mr. MANN. I am sure my colleague does not want to resist the blandishments of the Daughters of the Revolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the Daughters of the Revolution are well established, but this is an effort——

Mr. MANN. They will be better established when these records are gathered.

Mr. CANNON. This is an effort to make more Daughters of the Revolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman does not want to discourage that? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. This is not to encourage an effort to trace descent. It is an effort to put on record, for the benefit of this generation and succeeding generations, the patriotic services of our forefathers contained in records which are now in such a condition that you can not trace them.

Mr. CANNON. How about the War of 1812? How about the Indian wars, and so on, and so on? I want to suggest only one thing for the consideration of the gentleman. Do not the pension rolls show fairly well the names of those who served in the Revolutionary War?

Mr. PAGE. Well, if the gentleman will allow me, I may say that they are by no means complete, for the reason that their patriotism, possibly, ran naturally higher in our early history than in recent years, and a great many of the men who then served their country eminently never succeeded in getting on the pension roll.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that quite well, and I had occasion at one time to examine into that matter; and the legislation of Congress shows that there was more of opposition, from the legislative standpoint, to pensions for the soldiers of the Revolution than there has been since, and on more than one occasion the pension laws that were passed were repealed; so that, after all, the gentleman is only measurably correct. I commend to the gentleman the history, and he can get it by calling on the Commissioner of Pensions.

Now, if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will allow me, I think I ought to insist on this bill being matured and on striking out the appropriation, and let Congress from time to time determine what the size of the divisions is to be in the Navy Department and in the War Department.

Mr. PAGE. If the gentleman will allow me, since we have agreed to accept the limitation suggested by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. MANN], if it is the Treasury that the gentleman is now guarding, I think if he will allow the bill to pass, carrying this appropriation without limitation, it will require very much less money to accomplish this purpose than it will to carry out the purpose that he has suggested. I hope he will not do that.

Mr. MANN. There should be no further appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, a further appropriation would be in order.

Mr. PAGE. Not for this purpose, under the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman remember that some years ago the State Department had some scheme similar to this before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me I have a dim recollection, but I do not recollect particularly about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think for the present I shall object until we have some estimate of the probable cost of the clerical force for this work.

Mr. HAY. In the nature of things there could not be any such estimate, could there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the last 15 years we have been appropriating for the force engaged in the collection of the naval records of the Civil War, which appropriation is carried on the legislative bill. We specifically appropriate for the services of the persons employed. During a period of 20 years Congress provided for the collection of the military records of the Civil War; and before we undertake this work, not only should there be some accurate and definite information as to the extent of it and how long it will take, but, in my opinion, the legislation should be so guarded that the departments will not use this money to pay unnecessary compensation.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if we put in the limitation which was suggested here, so that the first part of the bill would read:

That within the limits of the appropriation herein made the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to collect or copy and classify, with a view to publication, the scattered military records of the Revolutionary War—

And so forth, that would be a sufficient limitation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no certainty that it could be accomplished, and it would be useless to authorize work to be done within a certain sum unless there was some possibility of it being done. I have very grave doubt—and I think every gentleman here has grave doubt—that $7,000 will be sufficient to enable the Navy Department to collect the naval records of the War of the Revolution and put them in shape for publication.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman know the character of the work to be done under this bill? Has the gentleman examined the subject, and does he know what sort of records are to be collected?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information I have on the subject is gathered very largely from the committee report on the bill.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman has read the report on this bill, he knows that these records are scattered over the entire country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that.

Mr. HAY. They are not like the records of the Civil War, which were all here, or brought here from where they were and copied here. These are in the different States, scattered throughout the whole country, and it is impossible——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it would be much more expensive on that account.

Mr. HAY. Certainly it would be more expensive, and therefore it is impossible to make an estimate with regard to the expense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it be necessary to send persons throughout the 13 original States, and to other places where there are records in public libraries and private collections, for the purpose of collating and copying them, the extent of the work, in my opinion, will be such that I doubt the advisability of authorizing it at this time.

Mr. HAY. Perhaps we can find some other way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It should be deferred, and for the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1679) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within Glacier National Park, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of Montana, approved February 17, 1911, ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the territory embraced within the Glacier National Park, are hereby accepted, and sole and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby assumed by the United States over such territory, saving, however, to the said State the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecution for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed in said State, but outside of said park, and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property, on the lands included in said park. All the laws applicable to places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall have force and effect in said park. All fugitives from justice taking refuge in said park shall be subject to the same laws as refugees from justice found in the State of Montana.

SEC. 2. That said park shall constitute a part of the United States judicial district of Montana, and the district and circuit courts of the United States in and for said district shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed within said boundaries.

SEC. 3. That if any offense shall be committed in the Glacier National Park, which offense is not prohibited or the punishment is not specifically provided for by any law of the United States or by any regulation of the Secretary of the Interior, the offender shall be subject to the same punishment as the laws of the State of Montana in force at the time of the commission of the offense may provide for a like offense in said State; and no subsequent repeal of any such law of the State of Montana shall affect any prosecution for said offense committed within said park.

SEC. 4. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any bird or wild animal, except dangerous animals when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting an injury, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of the waters of the park by means of seines, nets, traps, or by the use of drugs or any explosive substances or compounds, or in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and in such times and manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 354), natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the animals and birds in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the park; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the park. Possession within said park of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage or express company, or railway company, receiving for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined for every such offense not exceeding $300. Any person found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park, or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 354), natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the park, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 5. That all guns, traps, teams, horses, or means of transportation of every nature or description used by any person or persons within said park limits when engaged in killing, trapping, ensnaring, or capturing such wild beasts, birds, or wild animals shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized by the officers in said park and held pending the prosecution of any person or persons arrested under charge of violating the provisions of this act, and upon conviction under this act of such person or persons using said guns, traps, teams, horses, or other means of transportation, such forfeiture shall be adjudicated as a penalty in addition to the other punishment provided in this act. Such forfeited property shall be disposed of and accounted for by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That any person who shall, within the said above-mentioned park, commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act of May 11, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 354), natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $100 and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 7. That any United States commissioner duly appointed by the United States court for the district of Montana and residing in said district shall have power and jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any and all violations of this act or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of the park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish, and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by this act. That any such commissioner shall have power, upon sworn complaint, to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the violation of this act or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior, as aforesaid, or with any misdemeanor or other like offense the punishment provided for which does not exceed a fine of $100, and to try the person thus charged and, if found guilty, to impose the punishment and adjudge the forfeiture prescribed. In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of any such commissioner to the United States district court for the district of Montana. The said United States district court shall prescribe rules of procedure and practice for said commissioner in the trial of cases and with reference to said appeals.

SEC. 8. That any such commissioner shall also have power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with the commission within said boundaries of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 6 of this act, to hear the evidence introduced, and, if he is of opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial, shall cause such person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States district court for the district of Montana and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in the case to said court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

SEC. 9. That all process issued by the commissioner shall be directed to the marshal of the United States for the district of Montana, but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the arrest by any officer or employee of the Government, or any person employed by the United States in the policing of said reservation, within said boundaries, without process, of any person taken in the act of violating the law or this act, or the regulations prescribed by said Secretary as aforesaid.

SEC. 10. That such commissioner and the marshal of the United States and his deputies in the district of Montana shall be paid the same fees and compensation as are now provided by law for like services in said district.

SEC. 11. That all fees, costs, and expenses arising in cases under this act and properly chargeable to the United States shall be certified, approved, and paid as are like fees, costs, and expenses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 12. That all fines and costs imposed and collected shall be deposited by said commissioner of the United States or the marshal of the United States collecting the same with the clerk of the United States district court for the district of Montana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I will make a brief statement concerning the bill, and will then yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] to make a further explanation of its provisions.

The act of May 11, 1910, set aside a large tract of land on the public domain, consisting of about 1,300 square miles in the State of Montana, to be known as the Glacier National Park.

Subsequently the Legislature of the State of Montana passed an act ceding jurisdiction to the United States Government, and this bill is to accept the jurisdiction over the national park so created.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior stating that it is very desirable that the bill pass, for the reason that it is necessary in order to protect the park property from depredations that are now being committed there.

The form of the bill was worked out by the subcommittee during my absence, but it is thought that it is well and carefully safeguarded, and some features of it are designed to improve the administrative character of this bill. I now yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY].

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I will say, by way of supplementing what has already been stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands [Mr. ROBINSON], that the Secretary of the Interior is exceedingly anxious to have this bill passed at the earliest possible moment in order that he may have full control of this park and be able to protect the property of the Government and animal life in the park. The season is now open and the Secretary is without adequate authority to act. Although the park was not established until the spring of 1910, over 4,000 people visited there during the season of 1911. It has become one of the most celebrated parks in the world, and thousands of people will view its glaciers and lofty mountains during the present summer. This wonderful region contains over 60 glaciers, 200 mountain lakes, and every kind of fish and game known in that latitude. The bill before the House is based very largely upon the act of May 27, 1894, for the protection of birds and animals in the Yellowstone National Park. It has been carefully examined at the Department of Justice and also by officials at the Interior Department. The Public Lands Committee scrutinized the bill and amended it in some particulars. The amendments proposed by both departments were substantially adopted by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PRAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the Secretary of the Interior been over this bill and recommended its passage?

Mr. PRAY. The Secretary has examined the bill and the Attorney General has also examined it, and the recommendations of both departments have been complied with in so far as it seemed practicable to do so.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman will find that statement on pages 4, 5, and 6 of the report.

Mr. MANN. I have read it. I would like to know whether the Secretary of the Interior or the gentleman from Montana thinks it is permissible to do as is proposed by this bill in section 4—make one penalty for the interference with the protection of property in the park—and then in section 6 make an entirely different penalty for the same act; whether the Interior Department and the gentleman from Montana believe that in the same law you can provide in two different sections different penalties for the same act?

Then I would like to further inquire if, in the opinion of the gentleman, under the Constitution we have the power to provide that a man shall be tried for a felony by the commissioner of the court and sentenced to the penitentiary.

Mr. PRAY. Has the gentleman read the recommendations of the Department of Justice covering these features?

Mr. MANN. I have read the report and I have read the bill.

Mr. PRAY. I do not see anything in the bill providing for two different punishments for the same offense.

Mr. ROBINSON. The offenses referred to in section 4 and in section 6 are of a different character. That in section 6 relates exclusively to damage, injury, spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Let us see whether that is the case. I will read from section 4:

> Any person found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park, or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, * * * natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the park, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth. Then, in section 6, it is provided:

> That any person who shall, within the said above-mentioned park, commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, * * * natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon, or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction—

Both precisely leveled against the same act relating to natural curiosities, and that is what the park consists mainly of. In one place one penalty; in another place another penalty for precisely the same act. I do not know; it may be that you can do that under the Constitution. With my limited knowledge of the Constitution, I had supposed you could not punish a man twice for the same offense.

Mr. PRAY. Even admitting that the contention of the gentleman is correct, it would be a very simple matter to strike out the penalty in one section and refer to the other. I do not think the sections are the same by any means, except perhaps in a few minor respects. They relate to many different subjects. If the House should agree with the gentleman, the change can be easily made.

Mr. MANN. I can explain very easily how it came about. The bill is made up of sections taken from the Yellowstone act and sections from the Hot Springs act. Both these acts attempt to cover the offenses described, so the gentleman, in order to make assurance doubly sure, included the section covering the Hot Springs act and then put in the same section of the Yellowstone act.

Mr. PRAY. It is based on the two acts, and it was reviewed by both departments after it was introduced. I think if the gentleman should try to put both sections together that he would have to take nearly everything now contained in the two sections in order properly to cover the ground. Of course there is no opportunity to make a fair comparison of the two sections, while the right to object is reserved. If no objection is made to the consideration of the bill, both sections can be examined, and if it is the judgment of the House that two different penalties are prescribed for the same offense, it will be a very simple matter to strike out one and retain the other. If any penalty in the bill does not meet with approval of Members, it can be modified. The Yellowstone Park and Hot Springs laws have been on the statute books for many years, and I have heard no complaints about them. This bill is based upon those acts, and follows the recommendations of both departments of the Government.

Mr. MANN. It would be like two special acts to protect one place. One is punished here with one offense and another there with another offense, and you combine them in one bill and attempt to make two offenses in the same act.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: On page 7 it authorizes the commissioner to try certain cases. Is there any provision here that the offender shall be tried by a jury?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. This bill and the Yellowstone act authorizes the commissioner to declare a man guilty of a felony and put him in the penitentiary. I do not know that anybody has ever done it, and I do not know that anybody would go to the penitentiary. Of course, it is plainly outside of the power of Congress to enact any such legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, referring to section 4, the Secretary is empowered to make rules and regulations for the proper control of the park and prescribe penalties for violations. Section 6 makes it unlawful to commit the trespasses and acts referred to there, and I still suggest that a careful reading of the sections discloses the fact that the two sections seek to accomplish different purposes.

Mr. MANN. Take a practical case. Suppose a man goes into the park, takes his ax, and commits waste against one of the natural curiosities. He can be punished under section 4, can he not?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not sure whether he can or not.

Mr. MANN. It says that he can.

Mr. ROBINSON. Section 4 relates to the rules and regulations. It is doubtful whether you can make a crime of the violation of a rule or regulation of the Secretary of the Interior, but section 6 makes the act itself unlawful, and it is unquestionably true that you can punish for that violation.

Mr. MANN. Section 4 relates to the violation of the regulations and also to violating any of the provisions of this act. You put one penalty in one place for the violation of the provisions of this act, and you took it out of the Hot Springs act; and then you go over and fix another penalty in another place because you took it out of the Yellowstone act. Does the gentleman from Arkansas believe that if a man commits an act which is a violation of the provisions of the act and also a violation of the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior that he can be punished twice for that one act?

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. CARLIN. You could if it was not the same offense.

Mr. MANN. You might if it was two different jurisdictions.

Mr. ROBINSON. You may give the Secretary of the Interior the power to make rules and regulations for the control of the park or the property. You may not give to the Secretary the power to make regulations to punish citizens for violation of the regulations. You can make the act itself a violation of the law, as it is done in section 6, and perhaps you can thus catch him "going and coming."

Mr. MANN. Under section 4 you can put a man in the penitentiary for two years for violating the regulations, and under section 6 you can imprison him for one year for violating the law under your contention. Which is the worst? It may be that you can take him both ways.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, the offense under section 4 is defined as a misdemeanor. It may be true that the punishment is disproportionate to the character of the offense, but still I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that that is no valid objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill or its passage. I asked preliminarily whether the Secretary of the Interior or the Interior Department had approved this bill, and whether the gentleman had, because it violates the Constitution in a number of different particulars.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the chairman of the committee, when drafting this bill, consider the proposition of vesting the commissioner with the power of trying a man without a jury?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. That is done in all cases of that sort. An appeal is provided to the district court of the district in which the park is situated. That question has been gone through with in relation to the Hot Springs Reservation and the Yellowstone National Park, and I want to suggest to the gentleman that it is not desirable that trial by jury be had in the first instance in these cases of misdemeanor, so long as the right of trial by jury is preserved on appeal. It will gravely interfere with the administrative features of the bill to require a trial by jury before the commissioner.

Mr. SISSON. Would it not be infinitely better to invest the commissioner with the right to bind the man over rather than to give him the right to try the man, and thus have the man twice placed in jeopardy, once before the commissioner and then again before another judge and jury?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think it would be better.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects, and the bill will be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

HISTORICAL PAGEANT, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 333, to authorize the loan of obsolete Springfield rifles, etc., to the historical pageant committee, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to loan to the historical pageant committee of Philadelphia, Pa., for use in the ceremonies pertaining to the celebration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the framing of the Constitution of the United States, not to exceed 2,000 obsolete Springfield rifles, caliber .45, and such number of obsolete swords or sabers as may be desired and are on hand and available: Provided, That prior to the issue of these articles the committee shall execute a good and sufficient bond in such sum as may be fixed by the Secretary of War, guaranteeing the safe return of the articles to the Government arsenal from which originally issued, and guaranteeing the payment of the value of all articles not returned and the cost of repairs, if any be required, to such articles as may be damaged: Provided further, That this issue shall be made without any expense to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OLYMPIA, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 6283) increasing the cost of erecting a public building at Olympia, Wash.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost heretofore fixed for the erection of a public building at Olympia, Wash., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $150,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the original estimate was $92,700, it seems. Who has charge of the bill?

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Speaker, I presume I have charge of it. It is in my district, although it is not my bill. I know this, that there have been three unsuccessful attempts to let a contract for the construction of a building at Olympia, which is the State capital, and they have been unable to secure a bid that would enable them to construct a fireproof building. Nevertheless the contract was let to construct a building of ordinary stone construction, and not fireproof. The department is anxious that the building be fireproof. It is utterly impossible to construct it unless this appropriation is made. The contract has been let, and I understand the work has been begun on the basement of the building.

Mr. SISSON. The original bill provided for $30,000, did it not?

Mr. WARBURTON. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and this proposes to increase the amount $30,000.

Mr. SISSON. The original estimate was $110,000?

Mr. WARBURTON. I think that included the ground. I think the amount available was $100,000.

Mr. SISSON. And they are asking, then, for $50,000 more?

Mr. WARBURTON. No.

Mr. SISSON. The report shows that only $30,000 more is needed.

Mr. WARBURTON. The contract is let for $92,700. The balance of it, I presume, was taken in the purchase of the land. That is all that is available, and in order to make it fireproof and complete it, they will have to have $30,000 more, they tell me, which will make the building cost $122,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What excuse is given for letting a contract for a building that is inadequate for the public service?

Mr. WARBURTON. It will not be inadequate for the public service, but it will be an ordinary construction of stone and timber.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How large a place is Olympia?

Mr. WARBURTON. It is the capital of the State of Washington, and has between eight and ten thousand people.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they are not able to construct an adequate building there for $100,000?

Mr. WARBURTON. I have been before the architects myself, and there have been three unsuccessful attempts to get bids to construct the building.

Mr. SISSON. And the population of the place is from eight to ten thousand?

Mr. WARBURTON. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. And $150,000 is wanted for a public building in a town of that size?

Mr. WARBURTON. It is the capital of the State.

Mr. SISSON. Even if it is the capital of the State, why should they get $150,000 for a public building for a place of 10,000 people?

Mr. WARBURTON. The post office evidently is not planned for anything larger than the needs of the city.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi is in error when he says the total amount required for this building is $150,000. As I understand it, the amount will be $132,000.

Mr. SISSON. That is my understanding; but the bill provides $150,000.

Mr. SULZER. Then the bill is wrong.

Mr. SISSON. There are $92,700, and that would make $132,000. I think fifty or sixty thousand dollars would be ample to construct a building in a town of that kind.

Mr. WARBURTON. The contract is already let, and the building will be constructed, but it will not be fireproof. It ought to be fireproof.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects, and the bill will be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. SULZER. I suggest to my friend to let this bill go over until Mr. CLARK of Florida can be here. It is his bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has exercised his right to object, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

FOURTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON SCHOOL HYGIENE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 327, requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene.

The bill was read.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—I defer to my distinguished colleague on medical matters.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call attention to this voluminous and enlightening report.

Mr. MANN. That attracted my attention, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. And I want to congratulate the committee or whoever wrote this report on the information that it gives to the House, so that the Members might act intelligently on the bill. I think in view of this we ought to have possibly some information which inadvertently was left out, and that is in regard to the amount that would be expected should be appropriated and some little history of this organization that is to meet here at the time mentioned.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL] and reported without objection from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It carries no appropriation. Mr. DRISCOLL informed the committee that no appropriation would be necessary, and that no appropriation will be asked for either now or in the future, and on that representation the committee reported the bill. The bill simply directs the President to request the Secretary of State to invite the people who are interested in school hygiene to participate in this assemblage. These assemblages regarding school hygiene have been held for a number of years in different places, and it is a very important matter, not only to the children, but to our school system, and of vital importance to the people of our country.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that under the provision inserted in the recent District of Columbia appropriation law if we should issue these invitations to foreign Governments to participate in this Congress they might come, but that our own Government and its officials could not participate in that Congress?

Mr. SULZER. I am not aware of it.

Mr. FOSTER. They might go and pay their own expenses.

Mr. MANN. Why, the gentleman, my colleague, just introduced a resolution to permit the officials of the Government to participate in a congress of hygiene and demography, because it was claimed by Government officials that under the recent District of Columbia appropriation law they were not authorized now to accept and participate in these expositions.

Mr. SULZER. This is an entirely different matter——

Mr. MANN. That is precisely the same question.

Mr. SULZER. This has nothing to do with the Government making an exhibition——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SULZER (continuing). This assemblage will meet and discuss things about school children and good for the schools from a sanitary and hygienic point of view. The resolution should pass.

Mr. MANN. I suppose we would not want to issue invitations to have foreign nations come to an international congress here where the United States Government was not represented, where nobody could participate in it, for the reason that the resolution in that respect does not meet the present exigency, probably because the author of it, like most others, is not familiar with this little item inserted in the District appropriation bill. I am going to object when the time comes.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. I would like to state the citizens of Buffalo, by public subscription, will care for the people invited to this congress.

Mr. MANN. Well, I should doubt that. I do not doubt the gentleman believes it and the citizens state it, but I have heard that statement a great many times. There is no provision in the legislation upon that subject. I believe when we invite foreign Governments to participate in an international exposition or anything of the kind held within our boundaries we ought to be courteous enough to spend a little money to be properly represented there ourselves; but under existing law we should not be represented.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, providing this amendment was passed, would he object, provided that no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will say to the gentleman frankly, I am not in favor of inviting foreign Governments to an international exposition or a meeting of any kind without our Government can be represented.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. Would the gentleman be opposed to an appropriation to care for our representatives?

Mr. MANN. Well, probably not, but I do not desire to put myself on record for that. I never make promises in advance.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. I thank you.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will have to object unless the gentleman asks that it go over so as to permit them to properly prepare the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be passed for the present without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 19544.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. SABATH. The Kindred bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The immigration bill?

Mr. SABATH. Well, it is not an immigration bill, although it comes from the Immigration Committee.

Mr. RODDENBERY. This is a bill which was objected to by Mr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri?

Mr. SABATH. Some one objected.

Mr. RODDENBERY. To prohibit insane aliens from being received in New York, except under restrictions?

Mr. SABATH. Amending that act, yes, which prohibits the bringing in of the insane.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am very indisposed, Mr. Speaker, to object to the gentleman's request, but inasmuch as the House declined to permit debate on it and the extension of remarks by other gentlemen on the same subject were objected to, I must object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] objects.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to insert in the RECORD the following article by J. B. Barnhill, editor of the American Anti-Socialist, of Washington, D. C.:

With his usual adroitness, Hon. VICTOR L. BERGER, the Socialist member of the House of Representatives, in his recent speech in the House on socialism carefully avoided the fundamental principles of that doctrine.

I desire to direct the attention of the public to the fact that socialism seeks to destroy three things—private enterprise, private profits, and private property—and when you destroy these three you destroy competition.

Socialism seeks to convert private enterprise into community enterprise, private profits into community profits, and private property into community property. This is the fundamental teaching of socialism, and if Mr. BERGER really believes in the doctrine of socialism why did he not in some part of his speech, which we are told he intends to circulate by the million during the coming campaign, discuss the fundamental principles upon which socialism is founded?

The universal experience of mankind is that private enterprise, private profits, and private property are the indispensable bases of an advancing civilization; but socialism condemns these three factors of progress.

On numerous other occasions Mr. BERGER has pronounced sentence of death upon the principle of competition. It appears to be an irreparable calamity that Mr. BERGER was not present at the creation, for he could probably have saved the Creator from the mistake of building the world on a competitive plan. "Competition is dead," says Dr. BERGER. Something contradicts thee—I am afraid it is nature.

Individual profit is a thing which socialism will not countenance. Yet it is the desire for profits, the hope of this reward, which awakens all private and commercial enterprise. It is certain that if you take away the hope of individual reward for individual exertion you will destroy individual exertion. In other words, profit is the mainspring of all industrial activity.

Lastly socialism attacks private property. Here it arrays against itself all the strongest and tenderest affections of the human heart. Such a plan would destroy the home, which is the unit of government. The prophet and patriot alike unite in saying that the noblest dream of man is of a time when each may sit "under his own vine and his own fig tree and none durst make him afraid."

Arthur Young was well inspired when he said: "Give a man the secure possession of a rock and he will turn it into a garden." But Young did not tell the whole truth. All experience proves that the surest way to turn a garden into a desert is to make possession insecure, to substitute community interest for private interest, community property for private property, community profits for private profits, community enterprise for private enterprise.

Socialism has over and over again taken some of the finest garden spots in the world and turned them into deserts. Ruskin Colony in Tennessee, New Australia in Paraguay, Topolobampo, and a score of other such pathetic failures will occur to every student of this subject.

But the greatest and most instructive of such failures was at New Harmony, Ind. Here Robert Owen, father of ex-Congressman Robert Dale Owen, sank a princely fortune amounting to an annual income of $200,000 in a vain effort to supplant the competitive system with the "cooperative commonwealth." Dying penniless he left a priceless legacy in the record of that great social experiment at New Harmony, which teaches us that the doctrine that you can found a society where competition does not exist is a delusion, and that the effort to realize such a society must necessarily result in failure.

Individualism makes the desert blossom as the rose. Socialism would turn every garden into a desert.

Hon. A. J. Balfour, late Prime Minister of England, recently said:

"I say that a community based upon the perfectly impossible scheme proposed by the socialists—the scheme, I mean, which substitutes, for the individual enterprise, energy and self-sacrifice, which are the very roots of industrial prosperity, the bureaucratic arrangement of every man's life and every man's industry and every man's earnings—I say that that ideal is one which not only will bring disaster upon the existing generation, but which will absolutely ruin, as I think, the whole future of the community.

* * * * * * *

"It is upon the productive capacity, the inventiveness, the enterprise, the knowledge, the readiness to run risks, and to bear the result of risks when they go wrong; it is on this that a great community depends, and on this alone for the wealth it can use."

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make a request for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the same request.

Mr. BURLESON. And, Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] makes the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] makes the same request.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] makes the same request.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] makes the same request.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes the same request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. WARBURTON. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIMMONS] makes the same request.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] makes the same request.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And I, too, Mr. Speaker, make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TALCOTT] makes the same request. All these gentlemen—Mr. AKIN of New York, Mr. MANN, Mr. BURLESON, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. SULZER, Mr. RAINEY, Mr. CANNON, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Mr. HARRISON of New York, Mr. WARBURTON, Mr. EVANS, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. PRAY, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. RAKER, and Mr. TALCOTT—ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to let everybody speak.

Mr. MANN. After these requests are granted, I shall call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent along with the other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think after this large number of gentlemen have been granted permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD that right should be extended to everybody. I think there should be universal amnesty. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman put that request seriously?

Mr. ADAMSON. No. It is a joke, and the Speaker can so label it, if he desires. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

There was no objection.

The MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the next bill.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY ON FORMER FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 25764) to subject lands of Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands to homestead entry.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the unreserved lands within the former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, in the State of Nebraska, and the adjacent public lands on the east and south thereof withdrawn from entry by Executive order June 22, 1904, except as hereinafter expressly provided, shall be subject to homestead entry at such time and in such manner and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, as follows: All that portion lying north and west of the Niobrara River, together with that part of the southeast quarter of section 22, the southwest quarter of section 23, the west half of section 26, and all of section 27, in township 34 north, range 27 west, lying south and east of the said Niobrara River, shall be appraised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, entered and patented under the general provisions of the homestead laws, subject to the payment of the appraised price to be made in three annual payments as prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and all the remaining portion of said lands lying south and east of the said Niobrara River shall be entered and patented under the provisions of the one-section homestead law for a certain part of Nebraska, approved April 28, 1904, and acts amendatory thereof: Provided, That lands open to entry under this act shall not be subject to disposition under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States or other form of scrip or lieu selection, nor shall homestead entries made thereof be subject to commutation.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, of such military lands, lease to the State of Nebraska for the term of 20 years, for a reasonable price, the lands it now occupies as a State agricultural experimental station, and shall cause patent to issue to the city of Valentine, upon payment of the appraised price, for such area as it may reasonably need for waterworks, water power, and electric-light plant system, and for a fish hatchery, including the lands it now occupies for such purposes, and shall issue patent to Stephen H. Gilman, upon payment of the appraised price, to not exceed 5 acres adjacent to his milldam, and shall cause patent to issue to Charles H. Cornell, upon payment of the appraised price, not to exceed 68 acres.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to reserve from entry under this act a tract of land, not exceeding 640 acres in area, upon which the buildings used in connection with said military reservation are located, and to sell the lands so reserved and the buildings thereon at public auction at not less than their appraised value within one year from the date of the approval of this act if the Government shall not have appropriated the same to some public purpose: Provided, That the disposition of the said military reservation lands shall be subject to rights, if any, acquired by Charles H. Cornell and by the city of Valentine, when a village, by any acts of Congress: Provided further, That all lands so opened to settlement under this act, remaining undisposed of at the expiration of three years from the date of its approval, shall be sold and disposed of under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not more than 640 acres to any one purchaser.

SEC. 4. That the costs of carrying out the provisions of this act, including the necessary compensation of the custodian, not exceeding $60 per month, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be paid from the appropriations for the expense of the survey, appraisal, and sale of abandoned military reservations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves the right to object.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not object. I have an amendment to offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 24, by striking out the word "lease" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "issue patent."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does this include the whole of the reservation?

Mr. ROBINSON. This provides for the disposition of the reservation.

Mr. CANNON. All of it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 25, by striking out the words "for the term of 20 years, for a reasonable price."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 1, by inserting at the beginning of the line the word "for."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 2, after the word "station," by inserting the following: "upon payment of $1.25 an acre."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 23, by striking out at the end of the line the word "and" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] that there may be some doubt whether Mr. Gilman has a middle initial "H" or "F," because line 8, page 3, says "Stephen H. Gilman." Which is it?

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. It is "Stephen F."

Mr. MANN. Then, it should be amended on page 3, line 8, so as to make it read that way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out "H" in line 8, page 3, and inserting "F", so that it will read "Stephen F. Gilman" instead of "Stephen H. Gilman."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the initial "H" in the name "Stephen H. Gilman" and insert in lieu thereof the initial "F."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be inserted at the end of line 22, page 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, at the end of line 22, by inserting the following: "Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to reserve from sale or disposition any lands chiefly valuable for power purposes."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, the committee considered that amendment and decided that it is unnecessary. Under the law that power now exists, and while I do not know of any objection to the amendment, it is merely reenacting existing law. That is the view that the Secretary of the Interior takes of the matter himself. On page 3 of the report is contained a communication addressed to myself, in which the Secretary used this language:

In view of the department, H. R. 25764 would not, if enacted, preclude the withdrawal by the President of the United States, under authority contained in act of Congress approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), of such tracts as may be found to be valuable for water-power sites, but if any doubt as to the authority for such withdrawal exists the bill should be amended by adding to section 3 thereof the following—

He then suggests an amendment in the exact language offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Chapter 421 of Statutes at Large, page 847, volume 36, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President may at any time, in his discretion, temporarily withdraw from settlement, location, sale, or entry any of the public lands of the United States, including the District of Alaska, and reserve the same for water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other public purposes, to be specified in the orders of withdrawal; and such withdrawals or reservations shall remain in force until revoked by him or by an act of Congress.

The committee did not include the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, for the reason that it is already the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there may be and probably is some doubt whether the existing law would permit the Secretary to reserve water-power sites. He believes that he has that authority, but has also stated that he does not feel certain of the matter.

I doubt very much whether under the law the Secretary has that authority, because he has not as yet reserved these water-power sites, and this bill, which would become a subsequent law, expressly provides that all the unreserved lands within the former reservation shall be disposed of in the manner provided in the bill. Being subsequent legislation, it would take effect when it was passed as to all unreserved lands. I do not believe that the Secretary would have the power after the passage of this bill to make any reservations. As the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and other gentlemen contend that the Secretary now has the power, and as some of us believe that he does not now have the power, why can anybody object to a provision being inserted in the bill making it clear that the Secretary has the power of reserving the water-power sites?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I have said that as far as I am concerned I do not object, but I do not like to pass needless legislation when I am convinced that it is unnecessary. Hereafter it may be insisted that we intended to repeal some provision of existing law with reference to the power of the President to withdraw power sites, and so forth, for the reason that we did not embrace every provision of existing law concerning withdrawals. But unless the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] wishes to raise an objection, for my part I shall not object to the amendment, although I do not think the gentleman from Illinois should insist upon it for the reasons stated. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman should make his mark upon this bill if he insists upon doing so.

Mr. MANN. I have stated all the time that I should insist on the amendment.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. I have never had any objection to the amendment. It is a matter for the disposition of the committee. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT ASSINIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to recur to the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation in the State of Montana. It was passed temporarily. I am informed that the author of the bill (Mr. PRAY) has reluctantly agreed to offer some amendments which will not be objectionable to me. I do object, however, to writing a mere nominal consideration into the bill. I shall insist that there be a consideration; that the Secretary be authorized to sell upon terms that may be fixed by him. I yield to the gentleman from Montana for the purpose of offering his amendments.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, in order that this bill may receive consideration, I have reluctantly consented to offer these amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks leave to recur to Senate bill 5817. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us hear what the proposition is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In line 3, page 1, strike out the word "that" and insert the words "that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell."

In lines 5 and 6, page 1, strike out the words "be, and the same are hereby, granted."

In line 6, page 1, after the word "Montana," insert: "at a price to be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the board of county commissioners of said county."

In line 1, page 2, after the word "after," strike out the words "the passage of this act" and insert the words "such sale has been consummated."

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. PRAY. I send up the bill with the proposed amendments inserted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois suggests that this bill be read as it will read if these amendments are agreed to.

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be and he is hereby authorized to sell the jail building and the fixtures of said building now situate on the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana, to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, at a price to be agreed upon by the Secretary and the board of county commissioners of said county, and said county, by its duly authorized officials, shall have the right to enter upon the said abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation at any time after such sale has been consummated and remove said buildings and such fixtures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas to recur to this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move the adoption en bloc of the amendments as read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. You have not yet obtained unanimous consent to consider the bill. You have simply obtained consent to return to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the amendments be agreed to en bloc.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now on the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana."

FOURTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON SCHOOL HYGIENE.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to House joint resolution 327.

Mr. MANN. That has just been objected to, and I shall withdraw my objection if the gentleman offers his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to House joint resolution 327. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby requested to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene, to be held in Buffalo, N. Y., August 25–30, 1913.

Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the resolution the following:

"Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amended joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DANIEL A. DRISCOLL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

SUBWAY UNDER POST OFFICE, NEW YORK CITY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 7012) to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building at or near Park Place, in the city of New York.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in the name and on behalf of the United States of America, to grant, convey, and release unto the city of New York, in the State of New York, for such consideration, nominal or otherwise, and upon such terms, conditions, provisos, and limitations, if any, as he shall deem proper, such temporary rights and easements and such permanent and perpetual underground rights, easements, and rights of way in, under, through, and across the property of the United States situated in the Borough of Manhattan, in the city of New York, in the county and State of New York, and comprising the block bounded by Broadway, Park Row, and Mail Street, and also comprising part of Mail Street, as he shall deem necessary or proper for the construction and for the maintenance and operation in perpetuity of a two-track underground rapid-transit railroad running under, through, and across said property from Park Place to Beekman Street in said Borough of Manhattan, and also, if he shall deem proper, for the construction and for the maintenance and operation in perpetuity of a one-track spur or connection running under, through, and across said property from a point under Mail Street where a connection can be made with the existing City Hall loop of the so-called Manhattan-Bronx Rapid Transit Railroad to a point under Beekman Street where a connection can be made with the said two-track rapid-transit railroad above mentioned. The tracks of said rapid-transit railroad and of said spur or connection within the limits of said property shall be placed in subway or tunnel. The tracks of said two-track rapid-transit railroad within the limits of said property may either be placed in the same subway or tunnel or there may be a separate subway or tunnel for each track. In case the tracks shall be placed in the same subway or tunnel, such subway or tunnel may have a width of not exceeding 40 feet, outside dimensions; and in case there shall be a separate subway or tunnel for each track, such subways or tunnels shall be substantially parallel with each other and on substantially the same level, and each of said subways or tunnels may have a width of not exceeding 25 feet, outside dimensions, and such subways or tunnels may be placed not more than 20 feet distant from each other. The top of the roof of such subways or tunnels of said two-track rapid-transit railroad within the limits of said property shall be not less than 35 feet below the present established grade of the surface of the street at the intersection of the center line of Broadway with the center line of Park Place extended. The subway or tunnel for the said one-track spur or connection above described within the limits of said property may have a width of not exceeding 25 feet, outside dimensions, and the top of the roof thereof shall be not less than 15 feet below the present established grade of the surface of the street at the intersection of the center line of Broadway with the center line of Park Place extended.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to execute and acknowledge in proper form for record within the State and county of New York, and deliver to the public service commission for the first district of the State of New York, a deed or deeds to said city of New York as authorized in this act.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force immediately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that this provides that it shall take effect and be in force immediately. It should have provided immediately, if not sooner. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to this bill whether the post-office building in New York City is occupied for any other purpose?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is occupied by the Federal courts.

Mr. SULZER. And the United States marshal and district attorney.

Mr. MANN. Are there any offices in it except the post office, the courts, and the offices attached to the courts?

Mr. UNDERHILL. All the United States offices.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by "all the United States offices"?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The immigration office, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. Customhouse?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to find out what was there.

Mr. SULZER. I can tell the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I did not ask the gentleman from New York, Mr. SULZER.

Mr. SULZER. I thought the gentleman from Illinois wanted information.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I asked the other gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask the gentleman whether this authority, if granted at all, ought not to be granted on the recommendation of the Postmaster General, whether or not he ought to have the power to determine in reference to the plans if the building is mainly occupied for a post office?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The bill is simply permissive, anyway, and it is placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks it is merely permissive. Would he have any objection to making it clearly so by inserting after the word "authorized" the words "in his discretion"?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not think that would make any difference. I think that is fully covered in the text of the bill. It would delay its passage perhaps.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will agree to accept that amendment so that it will be within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, I shall not object.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will accept it.

Mr. MANN. Is that satisfactory to my friend from New York, Mr. SULZER?

Mr. SULZER. This bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator O'GORMAN for the public service commission of New York. It passed the Senate unanimously.

Mr. MANN. That does not add any weight to it.

Mr. SULZER. Just a moment. There is no objection to this bill. The Secretary of the Treasury approves of the bill. The authorities are building a great subway in New York City and it is being held up until this bill can become a law. As a matter of fact, the city of New York gave the Government the property on which the post-office building is located. It is a part of the City Hall Park. The city gave it to the Government for a post office. The Government built the post office on the property a good many years ago, and the deed to the Government provided that when the property is no longer used for a post office it shall go back to the city of New York as a part of the City Hall Park..

Another matter. It is contemplated to build a new post office ere long in New York City, and so this land will soon go back to the city of New York. All the city wants is the permission of the Government to build a subway down 100 feet below the surface of the street, and, of course, there ought to be no objection to it. The work is being delayed and contracts are being held up until the Government gives its consent. The Government is anxious to have the work proceed, and if we accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois the bill will have to go back to the Senate, and that may delay it until next year. The compensation that the city is to pay to the Federal Government is merely nominal.

Mr. MANN. This is of great value to the city of New York?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. It is the greatest engineering work that has ever been done in the city.

Mr. MANN. Have they got permission to run under anybody else's property in New York without compensation?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; unless great damage is done.

Mr. MANN. I guess not.

Mr. SULZER. Then the gentleman guesses different from the court of appeals.

Mr. MANN. Is this the only place, under this post office, where they can construct this subway?

Mr. SULZER. Yes. It is the route fixed by law.

Mr. MANN. If this is the only place where they can make the turn they had better enlarge the city. Nobody believes that story.

Mr. SULZER. This work is provided for by the legislature of the State.

Mr. MANN. That is all very true, but the gentleman can not make us believe that in New York City it is absolutely essential to go under one building, which the city does not own and does not control; that it is the only building in the city that the State itself can not control and that they made plans to that effect. If they have they had better get wiser men in charge of the plans.

Mr. SULZER. The work is being done by the city authorities and the public service commission. The legislature provided for it, and the routes are fixed by law and contract and can not now be changed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I apprehend the routes are not all fixed by law, so that they can not be changed.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; they are.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has that information, I would like to see the law, and, pending that, I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice, so that we may have an opportunity to look into the matter.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I shall accept the amendment.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Illinois wants to delay the greatest piece of construction work in the country.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the gentleman wants to prevent a holdup.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman wants to gratify himself by doing that, very well. I was trying to give the gentleman information about it, but the gentleman knows so much about everything in New York that no one can enlighten him.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to pass the bill over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the conference report on the bill H. R. 18985, the pension appropriation bill, and lay the same before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the conference report on the pension appropriation bill and lay it before the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1065).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agreed to the same with an amendment as follows: In the matter inserted by the Senate strike out the words "$500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 7, 8, and 12, and agree to the same.

The conferees further report that they are unable to agree as to amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and 11.

WM. P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

P. J. MCCUMBER,
HENRY E. BURNHAM,
BENJ. F. SHIVELY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The amendments of the Senate, Nos. 1, 6, 7, 8, and 12, to which the House recedes from its disagreements are as follows:

Amendment No. 1 adds $12,500,000 to the appropriation. This amendment was made necessary by the enactment of the law known as the act of May 11, 1912, which became a law after the passage of the bill in the House which increased the amount paid for pensions.

Amendment No. 6 is an amendment striking out the word "hereafter" and inserting in lieu thereof "not later than January 1, 1913," at which time pensions should be paid by check instead of by the present voucher system.

Amendment No. 7 is an exception made in the matter of payment by check in cases where pensions are paid to persons other than the pensioners, and is upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 8 provides for the conduct of postmasters and post-office employees in the matter of delivering pension checks going through their hands and which are to be sent in advertised envelopes. It is practically the same provision as was contained in the bill as it was reported to the House but which was stricken out on the floor of the House on a point of order.

Amendment No. 12 is simply changing the number of a section from 6 to 5.

Amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and 11, on which the conferees have been unable to agree, are amendments inserted by the Senate restoring to the bill a provision for the continuance of the 18 agencies and rent of the New York agency, as provided for in existing law.

WM. P. BORLAND,
JAMES W. GOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same with the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu of the paragraph stricken out insert the following:

"For salaries of 18 agents for the payment of pensions at the rate of $4,000 per annum each during the first half of the fiscal year 1913, $36,000.

"For salary of one agent for the payment of pensions, at the rate of $4,000 per annum, for the last half of the fiscal year 1913, $2,000; and from and after the 31st day of December, 1912, there shall be only one agent for the payment of pensions, to be appointed in the manner now provided by law, and who shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum; and section 4780 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment of agents for the payment of pensions is repealed, to take effect from and after December 31, 1912."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recede from Senate amendment No. 2 with an amendment which the Clerk has reported.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment of the Senate No. 3, and agree to the same with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and restore the matter stricken out, amended to read as follows:

"For clerk hire and other services at 18 pension agencies during the first half of the fiscal year 1913, and at one pension agency during the last half of the fiscal year 1913, and including not exceeding $10,000 for expenses of consolidating and removing records and equipment of pension agencies, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That estimates in detail shall be submitted for the fiscal year 1914 and annually thereafter for clerks and others employed in the pension agency, and the amounts to be paid to each."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York to recede and agree to the Senate amendment numbered 3 with the amendment which the Clerk has reported.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4 and agree to the same with the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert $2,125.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recede from Senate amendment numbered 4 and agree to the same with an amendment, which the Clerk has reported.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House further insist on its disagreement to amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, and 11.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF SUBWAY, ETC., UNDER POST-OFFICE BUILDING, CITY OF NEW YORK.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (S. 7012) to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post office at or near Park Place, in the city of New York—the one we have just passed over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to recur to the bill S. 7012. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman is willing to accept the amendment referred to, making it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. It has been reported once, and there is no use in reporting it again.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert in line 4, after the word "authorized," the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UNDERHILL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to somebody that it is getting pretty late.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 25738 be permitted to remain on the calendar, to be considered the next time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has authority to place that on the calendar again.

Mr. RAKER. I would like for it to retain its place on the calendar. It may be arranged so it can be considered next unanimous day; therefore I would like to have it remain on the calendar, to be disposed of the next time.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 25738 (No. 337 on the calendar) be passed without prejudice and that order is to take the place of the one requiring it to be stricken from the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what peculiar merit this bill possesses that it should retain its place on the calendar in front of 40 or 50 other bills that do not happen to be reached, especially when this bill is of such serious moment that objection is raised when it came up?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman I will say that all objection to this bill may be withdrawn. I have observed that after bills of considerable importance had been objected to, by a little talk and by a little seeing of individuals and amendments unanimous consent was had, and in five minutes the bill is passed; and it might possibly be that this bill might be in the same position. I certainly should have the opportunity to have it considered if there is no valid objection. It may not occur next time. All opposition, if any, may be withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. I do not see the gentleman had any complaint. He had one bill on the calendar objected to twice and it was stricken off——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 6, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on examination of channel between the St. Johns River, Fla., and Cumberland Sound, by way of the Sisters Creek out of the St. Johns River, with plan and estimate of cost of improvement, with a view to straightening and deepening the channel (H. Doc. No. 898); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on examination and survey of Bronx River, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 897); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 6, 1912.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bailey	Cummins	Massey	Smoot
Bankhead	Gallinger	Myers	Sutherland
Borah	Gronna	Nelson	Thornton
Bourne	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Townsend
Brandegee	Jones	Page	Warren
Bristow	Kenyon	Perkins	Works
Burnham	Kern	Reed
Burton	Lodge	Sanders
Catron	McCumber	Simmons

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BOURNE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably detained on a conference, and that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll of the Senate, 41 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. WARREN I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SMITH of Michigan answered to his name when called.

Mr. CLAPP and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is out of the city on important business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. LODGE. If there is no quorum as yet, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet ascertained whether there is a quorum and can not make the announcement until the Secretary reports.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts desired to submit some motion.

Mr. LODGE. I did; that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. BAILEY. That requires a motion.

Mr. LODGE. I make that motion.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not understand that the Chair put the motion.

Mr. LODGE. No; the Chair has not made the formal announcement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll——

Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators only are present, including the name of the Senator just called.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move——

Mr. BAILEY. This is what comes of trying to meet at 10 o'clock, before Senators can attend to their correspondence and department work. If the Senate wants to proceed with due dispatch it will revoke the order about meeting at 10 o'clock and meet at 12 and have a night session. Then we will be able to put in 9 or 10 hours a day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the presence of absent Senators. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the Senate will be executed by the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. McLEAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes a. m.). Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 48 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

DERRICK SCOW "EDNA" (S. DOC. NO. 901).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy reporting, under the provision of the naval act of June 24, 1910, that the Navy Department has considered, ascertained, adjusted, and determined the claim of the owners of the derrick scow Edna for damages arising out of the collision with the navy-yard tug Hercules in the harbor at the navy yard, Norfolk, Va., March 12, 1912, and found the sum of $183.76 due the claimants as owners of the scow, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4838) to amend section 96 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6354) to perpetuate and preserve Fort McHenry and the grounds connected therewith as a Government reservation under the control of the Secretary of War, and to authorize its partial use as a museum of historic relics, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 7012. An act to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building at or near Park Place, in the city of New York; and

S. 7195. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10169. An act to provide for holding the district court of the United States for Porto Rico during the absence from the island of the United States district judge and for the trial of cases in the event of the disqualification of or inability to act by the said judge;

H. R. 14053. An act to increase the pensions of surviving soldiers of Indian wars in certain cases;

H. R. 17256. An act to fix the status of officers of the Army and Navy detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service;

H. R. 22199. An act to extend the limits of the port of entry of Galveston, Tex., to include Port Bolivar, in that State;

H. R. 22526. An act to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906;

H. R. 25073. An act to authorize the Moline-Bettendorf Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between Moline, Ill., and Bettendorf, Iowa;

H. R. 25764. An act to subject lands of former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands to homestead entry;

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene; and

H. J. Res. 333. Joint resolution to authorize the loan of obsolete Springfield rifles, etc., to the Historical Pageant Committee, Philadelphia, Pa.

PETITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of William W. Latham, assistant to the superintendent of construction of the Life-Saving Service, and André Fourchy, assistant to the superintendent of construction of the Life-Saving Service, on behalf of themselves and other assistants to the superintendents of construction, United States Life-Saving Service, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the bill (S. 5173) to promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service, and (S. 7061) to create the coast guard by combining therein the existing Life-Saving Service and Revenue-Cutter Service, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HISTORY OF THE FEDERAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. CULLOM on the 25th ultimo, proposing to appropriate $6,250 to purchase 25,000 copies of the history of the Federal elections, etc., intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), reported it without amendment, submitted a report (No. 1018) thereon, and moved that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

COOSA RIVER DAM, ALA.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 7343) to authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, Ala., at a place selected for Lock No. 18 on said river, and I submit a report (No. 1017) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill, but I desire to be heard at some length on it, if it comes before the Senate. I have certain amendments to propose; and, unless those amendments are adopted, I shall desire to oppose the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why not object to its consideration?

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator from Alabama, if that is to be the case, will not ask for the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the Senator from Ohio will consume very much time with his amendments. This is a very important matter to us. If it is not passed now, the probabilities are that we shall not be able to have it passed at this session. Let us try it.

Mr. WARREN. I yielded the floor yesterday for a matter of 5 or 10 minutes and was not able to recover it during the entire day. Therefore I feel as if I must insist upon the privilege, at least, of asking that this conference report come up in the regular way and not allow the day to drift along in matters that should come up from the calendar. I want very much to accommodate the Senator from Alabama, but I do not feel that I can do so under the circumstances. Of course, if the bill will involve any debate—I have no objection to debate at proper times—but if there is to be debate now I must object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand the Senator from Wyoming to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Under the circumstance that the statement is made that amendments will be offered and that there will be long debate, I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not now in order. Pending morning business, that can not be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. One objection takes the bill over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has just stated that fact.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon; I did not so understand.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under ordinary conditions in the Senate, when will it be in order to consider this bill, either by unanimous consent——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At any time except during the morning hour. The motion, however, if made when there is a special order, must be made in a way to displace the special order in order to get consideration; but notwithstanding, at any time during the morning hour after morning business is closed, unless there is a special order, the motion would be in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My motion will now be in order, I understand, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet declared morning business closed, but was about to do so.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. BANKHEAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I had the floor, Mr. President, and asked recognition of the Chair with the suggestion that the Chair has announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama had addressed the Chair before the morning business was announced as closed, but that did not give him the floor for the purpose indicated. The Senator from Wyoming then addressed the Chair, but the Chair will ask the Senator from Wyoming to withdraw his request in order that there may be no controversy on the subject, so that the Chair may recognize the Senator from Alabama. With the consent of the Senator from Wyoming, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that if one objection is made to a bill on the day it is reported it can not again be taken up on that same day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The motion of the Senator from Alabama is not in order, and one objection will carry the bill over until to-morrow.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. President, one further inquiry. Will it be in order to-morrow morning after the morning business to make the motion that I have now submitted to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator makes it at the proper time it will be in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Chair kindly inform me when the proper time will be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not feel called upon to suggest when the proper time will come, but if the present occupant is in the Chair it will then be decided. The Chair has already, in response to a previous inquiry by the Senator from Alabama, stated the time when the motion would be in order.

Are there further reports of committees? If not, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 7422) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Conrad Springer; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 7423) for the relief of Frances A. Bliss; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 7424) to amend an act approved July 20, 1912, entitled "An act to authorize Arkansas & Memphis Railway Bridge & Terminal Co. to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River"; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 7425) giving a new right of homestead entry to former homesteaders; to the Committee on Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ANDREW MARTIN.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Michigan, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate certain papers accompanying the bill S. 4803, Sixty-second Congress, second session, to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Andrew Martin, no adverse report having been made thereon.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a few days ago when the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri rise to morning business? Morning business is not yet concluded.

Mr. REED. I think the Chair will call it morning business. My explanation will be so brief, anyway, that I can get through it quicker than I can explain what I desire to state.

A few days ago the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims. Subsequently I gave notice that I desired to enter and would enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. I now withdraw that motion, and will let the bill stand passed.

If I may be permitted, I desire to make a word of explanation. I withdraw the notice at this time because I am satisfied at this late hour of the session, if we were to undertake to further consider the bill, it would result in its not passing at this session. Therefore I prefer to have the bill stand in its present form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice of the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider is withdrawn. Is there further morning business? If not, that order is closed.

POST-OFFICE SITE AT PERTH AMBOY, N. J.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of calendar No. 879, House bill 21888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21888) providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall reserve the privilege of objecting if the bill leads to any debate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire, if I may be permitted, to say that the bill provides for the sale of the unused site of a former post office at Perth Amboy, N. J. There are parties who are ready to purchase it, and the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make the sale.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES IN OKLAHOMA—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 899).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill 4948, entitled "An act relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma."

The reasons for my action are stated in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated August 5, 1912.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 5, 1912.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 5, 1912.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: By reference from the White House I am in receipt of Senate bill 4948, as passed by both Houses of Congress, and entitled "An act relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma." I am requested to inform you whether any objection is known to its approval. The bill reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That conveyances of inherited allotments by full-blood Indian heirs, members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, made subsequent to May 27, 1908, in cases of allottees dying prior to May 27, 1908, shall have the same effect as if the allottee had died subsequent to May 27, 1908, and shall not require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death."

The history of this legislation is that prior to April 26, 1906, allotted lands belonging to full-blood Indian heirs, members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, were not subject to alienation unless there had been actual removal of restrictions by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the conveyance. On the date mentioned Congress passed an act providing that such conveyances would be valid if subsequently approved by the Secretary. Disregarding these provisions in the law many conveyances were made for inadequate consideration and in fraud of the rights of the Indians, and extensive litigation has since resulted in connection therewith. The Supreme Court of the United States disposed of the contested questions of law in favor of the Indians and of the contention of this department in the Marchie Tiger case about a year ago. Meanwhile, however, the effective supervision of this department over many of these transactions was prevented, when on May 27, 1908, Congress passed an act which provided in section 9 thereof as follows (35 Stats., 312):

"That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions upon the alienation of said allottee's land: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heirs in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee: Provided further, That if any member of the Five Civilized Tribes of one-half or more Indian blood shall die leaving issue surviving, born since March 4, 1906, the homestead of such deceased allottee shall remain inalienable, unless restrictions against alienation are removed therefrom by the Secretary of the Interior in the manner provided in section 1 hereof, for the use and support of such issue, during their life or lives, until April 26, 1931; but if no such issue survive, then such allottee, if an adult, may dispose of his homestead by will free from all restrictions; if this be not done, or in the event the issue hereinbefore provided for die before April 26, 1931, the land shall then descend to the heirs according to the laws of descent and distribution of the State of Oklahoma, free from all restrictions: Pro- vided further, That the provisions of section 23 of the act of April 26, 1906, as amended by this act, are hereby made applicable to all wills executed under this section."

It will be noted that this section reads, "That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions," etc. The question having arisen as to whether such restrictions were removed by the death of an allottee which occurred prior to the passage of this act, the matter was submitted to the Attorney General for an opinion. He exhaustively considered section 9 of the act of May 29, 1908, and held that where allottees had died prior to the date of that act, conveyances by their full-blood heirs of lands inherited from such allottees required the approval of the Secretary of the Interior in order to insure their validity, even though the conveyances might be made subsequent to the date of the act. In a later opinion, rendered June 7, 1911, the Attorney General again considered at length this matter in the case of an attempted conveyance made April 11, 1906, and held that the land was inalienable. The question having arisen in the local courts of Oklahoma, State and Federal, two decisions were rendered which were not in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney General, but the United States was not represented in the suits, and the different classes of cases requiring consideration in the several tribes do not seem to have been considered. From the opinion rendered in the United States district court in Oklahoma it appears that the decision of the judge went upon the ground that no reason appeared why Congress should have intended to distinguish between conveyances where the ancestor died prior to May 27, 1908, and conveyances where the ancestor died subsequent to that date. It is believed that a full consideration of the far-reaching effect of his construction of the law under the different conditions, and different statutes and agreements relating to the various tribes would have disclosed such a reason and might have led the court to a different conclusion. At all events, the Oklahoma decisions above referred to have not been regarded locally or in this department as finally determining the law, and on January 30, 1912, the bill now under consideration was introduced in the Senate.

In its then form the bill simply amended the act of May 27, 1908, by adding to section 9 thereof the words, "This section shall apply to the lands of all deceased allottees who died prior to the passage of this act." The bill was referred to this department for a report, and on February 26, 1912, a report was made recommending that the proposed legislation be not enacted. In that report it was pointed out that "the very purpose of the proposed amendment is to give section 9 of the act a retroactive operation so as to annul the effect of the Attorney General's opinion of August 17, 1909, and to validate, without departmental approval, all deeds which were illegally taken by purchasers of Indian lands inherited prior to May 27, 1908. Many fraudulent transactions would be legalized by the passage of this bill."

It was also pointed out that there was no reason for opposition to the existing law requiring the approval of this department in such cases—

"except by those who seek to avoid the payment of an adequate consideration for the lands received, as the department is now approving deeds executed by full-blood Indian heirs, conveying lands of deceased allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes who died prior to May 27, 1908, whenever it appears that the transaction has been made in good faith and for an adequate consideration."

There are, however, many cases now pending before the department for approval which would be validated without approval by the Secretary of the Interior if Congress should pass an act in the original form of S. 4948, upon which the above departmental report was made, or if that bill in the form in which it was actually passed by Congress should now be permitted to become a law. Among these cases are many where conveyances have been sanctioned by the local Oklahoma courts, but where the price paid to the Indians has been so inadequate that this department has insisted upon a reappraisal, and the white claimants are now tendering substantial amounts in addition to those which they have already paid. They are being disposed of in the department as rapidly as they can be properly considered.

Notwithstanding the specific statement in the report of the department above quoted, that "many fraudulent transactions would be legalized by the passage of this bill," on April 2, 1912, the bill was reported out of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs without making any reference to the report of this department, and on the same day the bill was called up and passed by the Senate. In the meanwhile, a bill on the same subject had been introduced in the House as H. R. 22083. This bill was not in form an amendment to section 9 of the act of 1908, but read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That conveyances of inherited allotments by full-blood Indian heirs, members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, made subsequent to May 27, 1908, in cases of allottees dying prior to May 27, 1908, shall have the same effect as if the allottee had died subsequent to May 27, 1908, and shall not require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

On May 14, 1912, the House bill was reported out from the Committee on Indian Affairs without having been referred to this department, and the committee simply stated that the bill was similar to Senate bill 4948, and quoted the report of the Senate committee already mentioned. Two days later, however, the chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs requested a report from this department on the House bill. In view of the record then existing it was clear to the department that the matter required the most careful consideration, and a letter was written to the Attorney General asking him for an expression of the views of the Department of Justice. I inclose herewith a copy of its reply. I would say, in addition to the objections vigorously expressed by the Department of Justice, that great confusion is almost certain to arise from the adoption of the pending bill. The Secretary of the Interior, acting under the advice of the Attorney General above referred to, has in many cases not only refused his approval to deeds which would be validated by the pending bill, but has approved deeds to lands in cases where previous deeds, which he had not approved, would be validated by it. There are many other possible complications too numerous for detailed mention here.

The careful consideration due to the importance of the subject and the pressure of departmental business caused a little delay in sending a report to the House committee. In view of occasional criticism of such delays it should be stated that the Department of the Interior has made approximately 1,000 reports on pending legislation to the present Congress. This does not include the mass of special pension legislation, for which special representatives of the Pension Office are detailed at the Capitol. It takes no account of the personal attendance of the Secretary and other departmental officials upon many meetings of congressional committees. In particular, during the past year there have been extraordinary demands upon the office force of the Indian service by investigating committees of the House.

On June 17, 1912, without waiting for a report from the department, the House bill was called up, and after some discussion was passed. Subsequently—on the same date, however—the Senate bill 4948 was called up and all after the enacting clause was stricken out and the language of the House bill substituted. The order by which the House bill had been passed was then vacated. In the discussion of the House bill the following statement was made:

"Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat what I said some time ago in the discussion on the Indian appropriation bill. We have in Oklahoma what we call a State board of charities and corrections. In that board there has been organized a special bureau for the specific purpose of looking after this very character of case—minor children's allotments and inherited estates. That department is very ably presided over by a young lady named Miss Katie Barnard, and her assistant in charge of this specific work is Dr. J. H. Stolper, and the grafter who gets anything past the vigilant eye of these two guardsmen will have to show something better than they have ever yet conjured up."

In view of the reference thus made to the recent establishment in Oklahoma of the State board of charities and corrections this department promptly, on June 19, wrote to Miss Barnard, inclosing a marked copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering the discussion, and inquired as to the extent of her authority in these matters and whether she had in fact exercised any supervision over the class of cases referred to. Her suggestions were also requested with a view to making a further report to Congress if the conditions seemed to justify. To this communication a reply from the assistant commissioner was received in this department on July 26, 1912, and I inclose herewith a copy. I shall call particular attention to some features of this letter later. Before it was received, and on July 13, 1912, the Senate bill was again called up in the Senate and a motion made to concur in the substitute amendment of the House of Representatives, with the following additional amendment, which was offered from the floor to be inserted at the end of the bill as it had been passed by the House:

"Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death."

The purpose of the proviso was stated to be to make certain that the deeds in question must be passed on by the county court. Objection was made upon the specific ground that this amendment had never been submitted to the Department of the Interior for a report. Senator SMOOT said:

"This is a very, very dangerous way of legislating."

Senator LODGE said:

"I do not think it is a wise way to legislate on any bill. The Senate has passed the bill and the House has amended it; and it is now proposed that we, without consideration, without understanding the purport of it, in a complicated matter, shall amend the amendment and send it back to the House. It seems to me it ought to take the regular course."

The bill was sent back for conference with the House. No report from this department was asked for by the conferees, and on July 19, 1912, a conference report recommending that the Senate agree to the House bill with the amendment which had been proposed in the Senate was submitted to the Senate and on the same day was agreed to without discussion. On the same day the conference report was presented in the House and led to a considerable discussion, in which objections to the bill as it was then worded were forcefully pointed out. Nevertheless, the conference report was agreed to.

The bill as thus passed removes all necessity for securing the approval of the Secretary of the Interior to conveyances of inherited allotments of full-blood Indian heirs, members of the Five Civilized Tribes, made subsequent to May 27, 1908, in cases of allottees who had died prior to that date. This is subject to all of the objections urged in the report of this department on the original measure, and to other additional objections.

It will be noted that section 9 of the act of May 27, 1908, provided—

"That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee."

The proviso to the present bill intrusts this approval to "the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death."

It is stated that many of the Indians who would be affected by this legislation have removed permanently from Oklahoma. The result of this proviso in the pending bill would be to transfer all questions relating to the approval of conveyances in such cases by the heirs of the deceased to courts far removed from the land itself and unfamiliar with its value and the conditions under which conveyances of this character are made.

But the proviso has a much more serious effect than that. It is sweeping in its terms and does not provide for a new approval by any court of deeds of the character herein given. An approval heretofore made possibly at a time when the court assumed that the matter would be passed on by this department, would nevertheless validate the conveyance. Previous approvals of the Oklahoma courts have been given in many cases where the conditions are those forcefully described in the letter from the State Board of Charities and Corrections of Oklahoma. The Department of the Interior is now obtaining for the Indians substantial sums in settlement of just such cases. I am glad to believe that, due to the efforts of Miss Barnard's department and to other causes, conditions in this regard in Oklahoma are now greatly improved, but this will be of no avail where approvals have already been given by the local courts. I invite special attention to the letter of the Oklahoma Department of Charities and Corrections in this connection. It adds to the explanation given on the floor of the House as to the reason why "there is very little market for this class of titles." The letter, as already stated, was not received until July 20, which happens to be the very day upon which the engrossed bill was sent to the White House for your approval.

It makes clear—

(1) The appalling extent to which Indian heirs in Oklahoma have been imposed upon in transactions of this character.

(2) That the State commissioner of charities and corrections has not been and is not now given the assistance necessary to cover the ground.

(3) That many improper transactions have already been approved by the local courts and would be validated if this bill should become a law.

(4) That until the State commissioner of charities and corrections has been given adequate assistance the scope of the act of May 27, 1908, should not be extended.

The complaint of the lack of cooperation from the tribal attorneys is now being given consideration by the department.

I recommend that the bill be returned to Congress without your approval.

Respectfully, yours,

WALTER L. FISHER,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1912.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter dated the 17th instant from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in which he requests an early expression of the views of this department concerning H. R. 22083, entitled "A bill relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma."

This bill in substance declares that conveyances made by full-blood members of the Five Civilized Tribes after May 27, 1908, of allotments inherited by them before that date shall have the same effect as if the allottee had died subsequently to that date, and shall not require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat., 312), provides in its ninth section:

"That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions upon the alienation of said allottee's land: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate of said deceased allottee * * *."

In an opinion rendered by the Attorney General August 17, 1909 (27 Opin., 530), it was held that this section is not to be construed retrospectively, and that consequently a conveyance of the allotment of a deceased full-blood allottee could not lawfully be made by his heirs if his death occurred prior to May 27, 1908, the date when that section took effect; but that the approval of the Secretary of the Interior was indispensable to validate such conveyance in view of section 22 of the act of April 26, 1906 (34 Stat., 137).

This view, it seems, did not meet with the favor of the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma and the United States district court for the eastern district of that State in the cases cited in the report of the House committee touching the bill in question. While this is to be regretted, I do not concede that the adverse decisions afford a sufficient reason why the Attorney General should recede from his formal opinion, particularly in view of the fact that in neither of the two cases was the Government represented or directly or indirectly given control of the litigation. Indeed, the case in the United States district court was not brought to the attention of the department until after the period for an appeal therein had expired.

Whether the opinion of August 17, 1909, be or be not correct, it strikes me that the bill, in so far as it attempts to validate the conveyances already made, is subject to the criticism that it is either altogether unnecessary in that regard or constitutes an attempted violation of the vested rights of the allottees. If, as a matter of law, the heirs have been entitled since May 27, 1908, to alienate without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and irrespective of the time when their ancestors died, the courts may be relied upon to say so whenever the question is properly presented for judicial determination; and no declaration now by Congress as to what the existing law was intended to mean is to be deemed necessary or proper to influence their action. If, on the other hand, the conveyances which the heirs have made without the assent of the Secretary of the Interior are void, I seriously question the constitutionality of an attempt by Congress, through a retroactive declaration, to make them valid and operative without the consent of the Indian landowners.

The allotments are the property of the heirs until they convey them to others. This private property is protected by the National Constitution as fully as any other property whatsoever, and is not subject to be taken away by an act of Congress any more readily than is the property of a white citizen. In the recent case of Choate et al. v. Trapp, No. 809, October term 1911, the Supreme Court said:

"There have been comparatively few cases which discuss the legislative power over private property held by the Indians. But those few all recognize that he is not excepted from the protection guaranteed by the Constitution. His private rights are secured and enforced to the same extent and in the same way as other residents or citizens of the United States. (In re Heff, 197 U. S., 504; Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S., 307; Smith v. Gooddell, 20 Johns (N. Y.), 188; Lowrie v. Weaver, 4 McLean, 82; Whirlwind v. Vanderahe, 67 Mo. App., 628; Taylor v. Drew, 21 Ark., 487.) His right of private property is not subject to impairment by legislative action, even while he is, as a member of a tribe and subject to the guardianship of the United States as to his political and personal status."

If the conveyances made are to be tested by the act of April 26, 1906, they are invalid—mere nullities—without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. That statute, of course, presupposes that the Secretary, in approving such a conveyance, shall have satisfied himself, among other things, of its fairness and desirability from the standpoint of the Indians and its accordance with the rules and regulations laid down to govern such matters. It would be no less than a repudiation of his plain duty under that statute were the Secretary to approve all such conveyances en bloc without investigation and regardless of whether the Indians had or had not been imposed upon in the transactions. As the present law does not tolerate but would actually condemn such a course upon his part, it seems obvious that Congress would not be justified in the same course upon the theory that it was merely taking over and exercising the function which now is lodged with the Secretary. The proposed validation of the existing conveyances, arbitrarily, and in violation rather than in accordance with the conditions under which they might now lawfully be validated may be difficult to sustain on constitutional principle. The conveyances, as they now stand, being void, the lands sought to be affected remain the property of the Indians as fully as though no conveyances had been made. (See 29 Opin., 131–138.) Congress, it would seem, might as well legislate the title away directly as by this indirect manner of breathing life and force into transactions which, in the eye of the law, are nothing. It may, of course, be argued that they at least suffice to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pass the titles by his approval, and that Congress may properly take unto itself and exercise directly this power which it has vested in him. But, as just indicated, that is not what this bill is intended to accomplish. It is not based upon such an examination into the merits of the transactions as the Secretary would be required to make, or upon any examination at all. I am not here concerned with the question whether such a measure if passed and approved could be technically supported by resort to a presumption that it had been preceded by a proper examination. The inquiry now respects the essential nature and effect of the legislation as determined by the facts as they are.

I would suggest, therefore, that before this bill is submitted for passage it might well receive the scrutiny of the Judiciary Committee.

In so far as this or any similar measure may be designed to operate prospectively, I have nothing to say beyond this, that such legislation inevitably adds to the number of ignorant and incompetent Indians bereft of the protection of the Federal law and subjected to the mercy of unscrupulous speculators.

Very respectfully,
For the Attorney General:

ERNEST KNAEBEL,
Assistant Attorney General.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTIONS,
Oklahoma City, July 23, 1912.

Hon. WALTER L. FISHER,
Secretary Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of June 19 addressed to Miss Kate Barnard, commissioner of charities and corrections, has been duly received. Miss Barnard has been out of the State for many months, as she is in very bad health, and I happened to be out of the State when your letter came and have just returned.

In regard to the powers and duties of the State commissioner of charities and corrections, I beg leave to say that under our law it is the duty of Miss Barnard to appear as next friend for every minor orphan in the State when it appears to her that the estate is being mismanaged or dishonestly handled. Armed with this authority Miss Barnard has intervened in behalf of approximately 3,000 orphans, nearly all of them Indian children whose estates were being exploited or disposed of by incompetent or grafting guardians. We have had many guardians removed, and we have saved for these children since this law became operative something like $100,000 in money and prevented the sale or return of something like 115,000 acres of land. In a large number of cases we have proceeded by what might be termed arbitration proceedings. In the case of the McCurtain County lands we challenged every transaction made through the county court, and by this means several large holders of land, such as mill corporations, etc., have agreed to abide by the findings of an arbitration board. We have several arbitrations involving two or three thousand titles pending. One arbitration has been completed. In this case the Interior Department named Hon. Dana H. Kelsey, this department named Dr. J. H. Stolper, and the party who had profited by many grafting transactions named Judge Thomas C. Humphrey, ex-Federal judge. The result of this arbitration was that $32,000 in cash was returned to the Indians and a number of parcels of land was reconveyed to the original allottees. By terms of the agreement we practically gave a clearance to all titles that we did not find enmeshed with graft and wrongdoing.

Because this department is only given the services of one lawyer, we have had our hands full, and in fact our legal department has been swamped. Naturally, we have only been able to operate in the several counties where the worst cases of graft were known to exist. I am confident that we could clear up the situation thoroughly did we have enough legal force.

We have been invited to come down in several counties by county judges who do not seem to be able to compel wholesale guardians to report, and while we have not been able to cover the ground as thoroughly as we wish to, yet the number of petitions for the sale of Indian children's properties has been reduced almost to a minimum. People are afraid to buy these lands, because they fear that we will intervene and spoil the deal. Therefore our moral power has been really greater than our actual work has shown. We have taken a decided stand against guardians' fees, lawyers' fees, and court fees eating up the proceeds of the sale of children's lands. Of course this does not make us popular with the legal profession, because up to the time we began to operate under the new law it was the fashion for lawyers to appear in most trivial proceedings so that they could get a slice out of the proceeds of children's properties sold by order of probate courts.

Strange to say, that while nearly all of our efforts have been made in behalf of Indian minor children, we have never received the slightest help, and in many cases we have experienced the open antagonism of the tribal attorneys who have not protected the children themselves but who do not seem to want us to protect them. Of course there may be some politics in this, because this administration is Democratic, while, of course, nearly all of the tribal attorneys are of the opposite faith. However, at the time we asked for this law it seemed impossible for tribal attorneys or any other attorneys for the children to get any hearing in any of our county courts. It was called Federal interference and was resented by all of the courts, but as soon as we appeared on the scene an entire change was made, and while we had several uphill fights at the start most of the county judges now cooperate with us gladly, and, as I stated above, the moral effect has been that the majority of petitions for sale of minor children's properties are very carefully considered and oftentimes refused.

You will find our law in the revised statutes of Oklahoma, a copy of which will surely be in your law library.

Yours, truly,

H. HUSON.

[S. 4948. Sixty-second Congress of the United States of America; at the second session, begun and held at the city of Washington on Monday, the 4th day of December, 1911.]

An act relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Be it enacted, etc., That conveyances of inherited allotments by full-blood Indian heirs, members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, made subsequent to May 27, 1908, in cases of allottees dying prior to May 27, 1908, shall have the same effect as if the allottee had died subsequent to May 27, 1908, and shall not require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted land heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court, sitting in probate, of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. H. GALLINGER,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act originated in the Senate.

CHAS. G. BENNETT,
Secretary.
By H. M. ROSE,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] was particularly interested in that bill. I ask that the message with the accompanying papers lie on the table and be printed, in the absence of that Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask that the letter from the Secretary of the Interior upon which the veto message just read is based appear in the RECORD, together with the message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered. The Chair understood the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to embrace that.

Mr. GALLINGER. My motion was that the message and the accompanying papers be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood, and it is so ordered.

THE PANAMA CANAL (H. DOC. NO. 900).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message of December 6, 1910, I recommended legislation directing the Executive to fix, within limits established by law, the rate of tolls for vessels using the Panama Canal. I then said:

> The present consideration of this question is necessary in order that the commerce of the world may have time to adjust itself to the new conditions resulting from the opening of this new highway.

In my message of December 21, 1911, I renewed this recommendation, and called attention to the fact that we are now near enough to the completion of the canal to make it imperatively necessary that legislation should be enacted to fix the method by which the canal should be maintained and controlled and the zone governed.

National as well as international considerations urgently demand the prompt adjustment of those questions, and I therefore deem it my duty again to invite your attention to this subject, in order that the necessary provisions may be made before the close of the present session of Congress.

There are certain needs which must be satisfied at once if there is to be no delay in the opening of the canal and the utilization of it by commerce. These needs are—

(1) The organization out of the construction force of a permanent force for the operation of the canal and the government of the zone;

(2) The announcement of the maximum tolls which will be imposed upon the commerce of the world; and

(3) The establishment of adequate coaling and other marine facilities, such as dry docks and repair shops.

If the necessary steps toward these ends be taken, the great waterway can be thrown open to shipping before the close of 1913—that is, within 15 months.

The establishment of a permanent organization to operate the canal and exercise our control over the surrounding zone is vital. The manipulation of the locks and the machinery, the administration and maintenance of the canal, will require a force of about 2,500 men, most of whom will need special training in the performance of their duty. As fast as one part after another of the construction is now being completed, the men, especially those with the most initiative, are returning to the United States to engage in other employment. It is plainly the dictate of foresight and economy to blend the present construction force into a trained force for permanent operation, instead of later going through the wasteful process of organizing a new force.

The establishment of maximum toll rates is another indispensable immediate need of the situation. In order that the canal may secure commerce against its competitors as soon as it can be handled, business must be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the new trade route; in order that they may make their calculations and build their ships, shipowners must know, about two years in advance, the maximum tolls which they are to be charged. We are already somewhat behind a safe margin of time in informing the commercial world of the proposed tolls, although, in anticipation of the appropriate machinery and in cooperation with committees of Congrees, the War Department has been collecting data under expert direction as to the proper rates of toll and the formulation of working rules as to the basis on which they shall be fixed.

Finally, an indispensable factor in the success of the canal is the certainty to the shipping world of securing necessary coal and marine facilities at reasonable prices at the canal. The ability to recoal at the Isthmus, instead of carrying coal in ballast to the diminution of income-earning cargo, may be a decisive factor in the availability of the Panama route. The same is true of docking facilities. Such facilities can not be improvised, and express authority should be given at once in order to commence with the necessary construction.

Congress is now in possession of the fullest information necessary for immediate action in regard to these essential points. Fortunately, there is no serious controversy as to the policy which enters into either of them. The subject is, happily, outside of the sphere of party differences. The discussions and differences of opinion which have arisen as to other phases of canal policy should not, in my opinion, be allowed to delay action on these vital and pressing subjects, which are by their nature entirely distinct and severable.

I earnestly again invite your attention to these matters in order that the necessary legislation may be obtained before the coming adjournment of Congress, and in order that the great work which has been so successfully carried on thus far may not be marred in the hour of its completion.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 6, 1912.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7195) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River, which was, on page 1, in lines 8 and 9, to strike out "to be selected by said company and approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE FACILITIES IN NEW YORK CITY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7012) to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building at or near Park Place, in the city of New York, which was, on page 1, line 4, after "authorized," to insert "in his discretion."

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 17256. An act to fix the status of officers of the Army and Navy detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service;

H. R. 25764. An act to subject lands of former Fort Niobrara Military Reservation and other lands to homestead entry; and

H. J. Res. 333. A joint resolution to authorize the loan of obsolete Springfield rifles, etc., to the Historical Pageant Committee, Philadelphia, Pa.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 22199. An act to extend the limits of the port of entry of Galveston, Tex., to include Port Bolivar, in that State; and

H. R. 25073. An act to authorize the Moline-Bettendorf Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between Moline, Ill., and Bettendorf, Iowa.

H. R. 10169. An act to provide for holding the district court of the United States for Porto Rico during the absence from the island of the United States district judge and for the trial of cases in the event of the disqualification of or inability to act by the said judge, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

H. R. 14053. An act to increase the pensions of surviving soldiers of Indian wars in certain cases, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

H. R. 22526. An act to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the routine business, I shall submit some remarks on the Panama Canal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice given by the Senator from California will be entered on the calendar.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Senate now resume the consideration of the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming moves that the Senate resume the consideration of the conference report on the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, the question now is on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield while I make a request?

Mr. WARREN. I will be glad to yield if it is for something that does not lead to debate. If it does, I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. BORAH. It may lead to objection, but it will not lead to debate.

Mr. WARREN. I reserve the privilege of objecting if it does lead to debate.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Mr. BORAH. I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday morning after the routine morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 22913, Calendar No. 856, and vote upon the bill, together with the amendments, before the close of that legislative day.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. It is the bill to create a department of labor.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, while I do not desire to object to the request of the Senator, in connection with this bill I do wish to express the hope that we may combine in the unanimous-consent agreement the cotton bill and the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to give notice——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To what does the Senator from Utah object—to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I object to the request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to give notice that on Saturday morning after the routine morning business I will move to take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to give notice that, unless somebody else does so, I will try to have taken up in lieu of that the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for a single term for the President.

Mr. BORAH. All of which will make a very interesting discussion.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me that I may offer a resolution?

Mr. WARREN. I make the same observation, that if it leads to no debate I will yield.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk may be read, and that it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 372), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 3345, being a bill to amend the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and that the same be laid before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. What is that bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. I heard read the number of the bill and the title of it, to amend the interstate commerce act, but is that the bill to regulate the interstate shipments of liquor?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it is not. It is a bill providing an amendment to the Sherman law to strike out fines as to individuals and making jail sentences imperative as to individuals.

Mr. WARREN. It does not come up until to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection; I should like to strike it out myself.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I hope we may now proceed with the consideration of the conference report and get a vote on it.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the anxiety of the Senate to dispose of this conference report, and I should not interpose any objection except some valid reason existed for the rejection of the agreement of the conference; but it seems to me a reason does exist in the provision relating to the civil service.

The conference committee has agreed upon limiting the term of civil-service employees within the District of Columbia to seven years. This, Mr. President, must lead to a deterioration in the service and to its demoralization. I do not know that I would state the case quite so strongly as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] stated it a few days ago, that it means a restoration of the spoils system, but it does at least mean an inauguration of the policy of rotation in office; and that policy is the partner and the twin brother of the spoils system. The two have always been associated.

This subject has been frequently under discussion since the very foundation of the Government. Until the year 1820 the term of appointive officers confirmed by the Senate was unlimited. They were supposed to hold their positions during good behavior. At that time a bill was passed limiting the term of such officials to four years. On that Mr. Jefferson expressed himself as follows:

> This is a sample of the effects we may expect from the late mischievous law vacating every four years nearly all the executive offices of the Government. It saps the constitutional and salutary functions of the President and introduces a principle of intrigue and corruption, which will soon leaven the mass, not only of Senators, but of citizens. It is more baneful than the attempt * * * to make all officers irremovable but with the consent of the Senate; it puts all appointments under their control every four years and will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office.

This objection applies with equal validity to those appointive officers who are selected by heads of departments and bureaus as well as to those appointed by the President. In the year 1846 Mr. Andrew Johnson, afterwards President, introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives fixing eight years as the maximum period for subordinate positions. This resolution was not regarded favorably. If there is any one thing that is necessary in our civil service it is that it should afford a career, an opportunity for a life work for those who aspire to hold positions in the Government service. No private business could succeed under such a regulation as this by which at the end of seven years an incumbent automatically goes out of office. It is true there is a provision here authorizing the head of the bureau or the department to reappoint; but if that is intended in good faith to maintain the civil service in its efficiency, why was there not incorporated a provision to the effect that if his record be good the clerk shall remain? As it is now, indiscriminately, without regard to the record, ignoring efficiency, the occupant of an office loses his position at the end of seven years, and is at the tender mercy of whoever may be at the head of the bureau or department.

Mr. President, I think this proposed legislation is of so serious a nature that it ought not to be adopted. There is another phase of it. The provision is limited to the District of Columbia. What have the subordinate officials in the District of Columbia done that they should be discriminated against in this manner? I know there is an impression on the part of some that those in the Government employ in the District are chiefly occupied with securing increases of salary or an enlargement of their holiday privileges; that many of them seek to give the minimum of service with the maximum of compensation. Mr. President, while some may share this disposition, there is no justification for any such sweeping condemnation. The opportunity of a subordinate official in the District of Columbia is not of the best. He has little opportunity for promotion; the larger promise of American life is denied to him, yet these subordinates have shown a degree of earnestness and zeal—at least most of them—in the service of the Government, which is worthy of all commendation. It is rather alien to the American spirit to continue men in one position, but we certainly need and must have men who are willing to give their lives to some department of Government activity, and they should be allowed to occupy their positions under the very best auspices.

Now, I want to call attention to some rather singular features of this conference agreement which, it seems to me, may have been overlooked by the conferees. It is stated in section 5, as agreed upon:

That on and after September 1, 1913, all appointments to positions in the classified service of the executive departments within the District of Columbia provided for at annual rates of compensation shall be made, after the probationary period shall have expired, for terms of seven years each; at the expiration of each such appointment the employment of each person so appointed shall cease and determine.

Then follows another provision, slightly different, affecting those who are already in the service. What do these propositions mean? They mean that a carrier in the post office, a clerk in the post office, a machinist in all departments, except the Navy, if he is so unfortunate as to be employed in the District of Columbia, is put out of office at the end of seven years. You make one rule for post-office employees at Washington, namely, one of a limited tenure of seven years, and another rule at Baltimore, namely, of unlimited tenure.

Mr. President, there are certain possibilities which lurk in this proposed law, to which I think it would be well to call attention. It is the habit of many to judge of a law or a legislative enactment according to the evasions which might be practiced under it. Let us see what might be done if this 7 years' limitation in the District is adopted. After 6 years and 11 months of service in the District of Columbia a subordinate employee could be transferred to some locality outside of the District, and the provision would not apply at all. At the expiration of the same period some one might be brought in from the outside and the provision would not apply to him until another seven years. If there is to be a limitation of tenure—and I should most decidedly oppose that—let us have the courage to apply it not merely to those in the District of Columbia but to all Federal employees in all cities.

I repeat what I said a few minutes ago, that if we are to insure competency in any particular department, there is no method so favorable as permanency of tenure. You will not be able to obtain the best talent for these positions if it is known that the tenure is limited to seven years or any other period. There will be at least the impression that when that time has expired favoritism will rule, and not only will the limited tenure but the probability of favoritism prevent many of the best young men and young women from taking the examination and seeking to enter the Government service.

Again, Mr. President, this provision of the conference report, it seems to me, is hardly fair to the Senate. There was a provision in the bill as it came from the House limiting the tenure to five years. That was stricken out practically without objection. The Senate put the seal of its disapproval on the policy of limited tenure. Another proposition was presented here even more objectionable, as I think, limiting absolutely to 10 years the term of service of subordinate employees. That was discussed and voted down without a roll call, and, as I recall, with practical unanimity.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this provision is so serious and works such a revolution in our civil service that, notwithstanding our earnest desire to conclude the session and dispose of this bill, it should be rejected and sent back to conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is curious to me that in all the discussion of this question gentlemen avoid the real issue. The real issue is to prevent, if possible, a civil-service pension list in this country; and in their discussion of every possible remedy that has been offered to avoid that, Senators themselves never offer anything as a preventive. It is useless to try to disguise from the people of the country that that is what is behind this discussion and difference of opinion.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio perfectly that, take the civil-service employees of the Government by and large, they are wonderfully efficient and they are industrious up to the full mark of the requirements; but every Senator must admit—and a Senator so candid and so full of intellectual integrity as the Senator from Ohio above all must admit—that if we continue in the present system we must either always have a lot of superannuated deadwood in the service, weighting it down and obstructing its efficiency, or we must after a while go to a civil-service pension list or retirement list, whichever you choose to call it.

The people of this country, in my opinion, are not ready for that, and never will be ready for it until they are also ready to accept a much broader proposition, and that is a proposition to put upon a retirement list and to furnish with a sufficient old-age pension to prevent absolute suffering all men everywhere who have worked hard through their lives, who have reached an old age, and who can not maintain themselves by their independent exertions any longer. Whenever that day shall come, then it may be that fair-minded people will also be prepared to do the same thing for those who are engaged in the public service.

But speaking for what I believe to be the people's opinion and expressing, at any rate, my own, I do not think they think that it will be ever just to put upon a retirement list at public expense a nonworker simply because he happens to be superannuated and further happens to have been in the public service, when the same thing is not done for a shoemaker, for a blacksmith, for a teacher, for a preacher, and all the other people who make up our society, all of whom do at least an equally useful work, and most of whom receive less pay if you take their returns in their business and calculate what they receive by the year.

Mr. President, efficiency is a great thing in public service, but efficiency even in the individual case is not all nor is it the chief thing. If you want merely an efficient public service in its administrative characteristics you can go to Prussia and get it to-morrow in a much higher condition than you have here. It has spelt bureaucracy there; it spells, in the long run, bureaucratic influence and bureaucratic control everywhere.

I, last of all, would be willing to "call down upon ourselves" what Mr. Jefferson calls "the cormorants" who are seeking office. But this provision, agreed to in conference, seems to have been more misunderstood than anything I have heard discussed in the Senate. I deny absolutely that it does deteriorate in any way the public service and that it will call down any more upon our heads than at present the cormorants who are seeking office.

Mr. President, the Senator who has just taken his seat, quoting further from Jefferson, referred to his criticism of the order of four-year tenure. It was a totally different thing than this. The men who got into the public service under it did not get into it through any civil-service rules at all. They were appointed in the first place purely arbitrarily, and the law then proposed, and passed, I believe, permitted them to be discharged at the end of four years arbitrarily again. This law neither admits them arbitrarily nor does it permit them to be discharged arbitrarily. All any Senator has to do in order to arrive at those two conclusions is to read the conference provision itself.

The Senator says that no business establishment could have been run upon the lines of this conference report. No; and no business establishment could be run, and no business establishment ever has been run, upon the lines of our present system either. The reason is very plain in both cases. A private business is one thing and public service is another. What man engaged in a great business would undertake, for example, when he was employing men to do certain things, to establish a board outside, to submit them to examination, and to admit into his service such men only as made a certain mark from an eligible list, to be transferred to him whenever a vacancy occurred in the machine shop or somewhere else? What farmer of common sense would undertake to hire his employees that way? What factory man would undertake it in a cotton factory or a steel factory or anywhere else? So that the attempted analogy falls to the ground because it is equally destructive to both systems.

Nowhere do we model our public service upon the example of private industries, because the object sought in private industry is the making of money, and the dead wood in private industry is unscrupulously thrown aside in most cases, although I am glad to see now that some great industrial establishments are beginning to think that the industry ought to stand the loss of the worn-out human machinery as much as it stands the loss of the worn-out metal machinery, and that some of them are beginning to have a retirement list of their own, and I believe that where they have they get better service from those who are not superannuated, because of the hope that they have that when they are superannuated they will be taken care of. But this analogy, too, falls all to the ground.

The Senator says that this provision "ignores efficiency." How the Senator from Ohio could have drawn it after reading the provision I simply can not understand.

In one criticism I join him. This provision ought not to be limited to the District of Columbia. I see no sense in that, and if, in advocating the provision, I advocate it as it is limited to the District of Columbia, it is simply because that is the best I can get just at this time. It ought to apply to the entire public service.

If the Senate will pardon me a moment, I will read the provision. I am afraid it has not been generally read:

That on and after September 1, 1913, all appointments to positions in the classified service of the executive departments within the District of Columbia provided for at annual rates of compensation shall be made after the probationary period shall have expired.

Now, I want to call your attention to the fact that there is in the present system a "probationary period," just as there is under this proposed law, except that the present probationary period is one year instead of seven years. If all the great ills that the Senator from Ohio prophesies would come from the adoption of this conference report would flow from that fact, why do they not flow from the fact of the existing probationary period of one year? In nine cases out of ten, I may safely say—I believe in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred—the man who goes into service on a probationary period under the present system continues in the service, and he continues in the service substantially for the same reason that he will be permitted to be continued in the service under this conference report, to wit, that he is up to the prescribed standard of efficiency during his probationary period. So much for that. Let me go on with the reading:

After the probationary period shall have expired, for terms of seven years each; at the expiration of each such appointment the employment of each person so appointed shall cease and determine.

Yesterday, or the other day, I do not remember when, some Senator upon that side, I do not remember now who it was, said that at the end of seven years there would be a wholesale going out of office and a wholesale substitution of new employees. The Senator who said that forgot that somewhere between 12½ and 15 per cent of the employees of the Government go out every year, either by death or by resignation, and with a probationary period of seven years, if you take 15 per cent as the average of those who go out each year, 90 per cent of the full force of the civil service would have gone out before the expiration of the seven-year period by death or resignation. So 15 per cent of them would have substitutes appointed one year from this year, 15 per cent two years from next year, 15 per cent three years from this year, and thus on down to the end of the seven-year probationary period. So it is not true that there would be at any one time "a wholesale replacing" of public officials.

Let me go on with the reading:

And the employment——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, and out of those appointed many of them would be reappointments, of course, under the terms of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and they are required to be reappointed by this very provision and under a prescription of standards of efficiency contained elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. All the efficient ones.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Provided they will come up to a fair standard. I will read the language in a few minutes. I might as well read it now. The language is—Provided, They shall be up to the standard of efficiency then in force and as hereinbefore set forth.

In this same bill—

And capable of rendering a full measure of service in return for the salary of the place.

In other words, everybody understands what that is for. It is to have a system which will work by its own motion to get rid of the superannuated, those who are not "up to the full measure of service in return for the salaries of the place." Now, in private business——

Mr. GALLINGER. Superannuated and inefficient men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is right; and inefficient; but the real trouble is, for the most part, that the inefficient are inefficient because of superannuation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Most of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As a rule, the longer a man stays, everything else being equal, the more efficient he is, unless he becomes superannuated.

I remember once under Mr. Cleveland's administration—to show how these things work—when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was Secretary of the Interior, a very distinguished officer in the Confederate service had been employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, I think it was, and was discharged. He had to be rolled to his office in a chair; he was performing no service of any sort. At once a cry went up from all over the South and among the southern Members. Nearly every southern Senator and every southern Congressman went down at once to the Secretary of the Interior insisting that this man should be reinstated—not that he was doing any good, but because we had become accustomed to the idea that other men who were doing equally no good all through the service were being kept in. The Secretary of the Interior subsequently had to give way to the pressure and restore this man, who was incapable of doing any work at all.

I have in my mind right now a condition stated to me by one of the most efficient employees in one of the great departments here, a man who, although a Democrat, has become under Republican administrations a foreman in his room purely by force of the efficiency of his services. He tells me that he does, in addition to his own work, the work of two old ladies nearly every day almost, in order to keep them from being discharged.

Now, that is going on all through the service. You must come to one of two things—to one of three things. You must either change the present system or else you must do what private businesses do, unscrupulously and inhumanly hurl these people out. For the most part they have saved nothing, not because they could not have saved, but because they would not; but the fact is there all the same. You have to thrust them out into a poorhouse or else you have to originate some system whereby without throwing upon the bureau chiefs the affirmative burden of discharging these old men and old women they will be discharged by operation of law, and discharged before they have reached this condition, and discharged with the warning beforehand that they may be discharged. That will make them save money to take care of themselves in their old age. Put in any man's mind the idea that he has a job for his entire lifetime, regardless of old age inefficiency, and unless he is an exception to the general rule of human nature he is not going to put aside anything for a rainy day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment. If, on the contrary, you put into any man's mind the idea that at the end of a certain period he may have to go if he does not come up to a certain requirement, then the man is going to do two things. He is first going to so conduct and train himself during the probationary period that he may, if possible, come up to the requirement, and, in the next place, for fear he may be discharged anyhow, he is going to save something for himself to meet that event.

Why is it that our sheriffs, who are elected for four years, our clerks and various people in the civil offices in the States, who are elected by the people, generally save something? It is because they know that at the end of each term they may go out. Why is it that a Representative elected for two years and a Senator for six years does not spend every single thing that he gets as a rule? It is because although he hopes to remain in, if his service recommend him to the people, he knows he may go out, and it would be a matter of idiocy to leave himself stripped in his old age of all support.

I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. By superannuation I suppose the Senator from Mississippi means those who have reached a certain age in the service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not. If you should undertake to have a civil-service retirement list you would be compelled to designate a certain age as a rough way of approximating real superannuation or inefficiency on account of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Real superannuation——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One minute. This provision not only does not fix any age, and it ought not to, but it uses the words "lacking in efficiency" and "not coming up to the full measure," leaving the party to go out not only because he is inefficient because of superannuation, but because of any other marked inefficiency which prevents him from giving a full measure of service for the salary which he gets.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are about 35,000 employees in the classified service of the United States. Does the Senator know how many of those employees have reached the age at which, under our ordinary acceptation of the term, superannuation would be compelled to leave it on account of age?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I not only do not, but from my standpoint it has nothing under the sun to do with this case. I am speaking of real superannuation, not of a nominal superannuation fixed by naming a certain year. I know men who are 80 years of age who are just as efficient for all ordinary work as I myself am, and I know men who are no older than I or some years younger who are really superannuated. Now I——

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not disturb the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you were going to fix a retirement list, and you were going to put men on half or quarter pay when they reach a superannuation, you would be compelled to fix a year. It would be rough and approximate but the only way of legally designating superannuation.

Now, one of the good things about this provision is that you are not compelled to fix a year which frequently sounds false to the fact. I go on with the reading:

Who were appointed prior to September 1, 1912, shall cease and determine, unless previously separated from the service, within one year after the 31st day of August, 1919, the particular date of such termination within said year to be determined by the head of the department concerned, and on the basis of the length of service, within the classified service, of each such person prior to September 1, 1912.

Now, here follows the provision:

Provided, That all persons separated hereunder from the classified service shall be eligible for and may, in the discretion of the head of the executive department, be reappointed without examination for additional periods of seven years if—

And so forth.

Now, this measure has not only been misunderstood upon the floor, but it has been very much more seriously misunderstood, and therefore misrepresented—and when I use the word "misrepresented" I do not mean anything offensive by it; I assume that the misrepresentation has come honestly from misunderstanding—in the public prints here in the city of Washington. You would not gather from reading the editorials in any one of the three papers that I have read here that anything of this sort was in the law at all—"be reappointed without examination"—nor that all without exception would have a right to reexamination.

If 85 or 90 per cent of these people have become separated from the service before the expiration of the seven-year period prescribed here by either death or resignation, and there were only 20 or 15 per cent who would be left, it is fair to suppose that any honest man executing the law would reappoint perhaps three-fourths of those left in on their efficiency record. This provides for an efficiency record; this language, "herein provided for," in the bill, to which this is a provision, means that; and it is to be taken for granted that where no self-interest intervenes to misguide public officials they are going to obey the law in its spirit. The spirit of this law is that when a man comes to the end of his seven-year period he shall be appointed without reexamination, provided he has lived up to the standard of efficiency, and provided, which is very important, that he is "capable of rendering a full measure of service in return for the salary of the place to which he may be appointed."

Then follows the provision safeguarding honorably discharged soldiers or sailors. Then follows the provision safeguarding the constitutional right of executive officers to remove, at any time, in accordance with the law, "for good and sufficient cause, any employee of his department."

Now, that is the whole conference provision.

I hold in my hand an analysis of what this law means. I am going to terminate my remarks by putting it in the RECORD, reading it first. The analysis is in nine parts, and it has been made by one of the most efficient and experienced public servants known to all of us. I do not name him, merely because I do not think that he would like to be named in connection with it. I have gone through with it and I do not find a single point he makes that can be quarreled with as inaccurate:

1. No person now in the classified service can be separated from the service before September 1, 1919.

That is right important, because in the meantime if this provision be found to be crude in any respect then it can at any time during seven years be cured and remedied by the Congress of the United States, so that the great object aimed at, the prevention of the obstruction of the public service by inefficient people, can be arrived at in a more satisfactory way.

2. Under existing conditions, according to the Civil Service Commission, about 15 per cent of the force is changed each year as the result of deaths, resignations, etc.

That I have gone into sufficiently without further comment.

3. When the period arrives—September, 1919—when those now in the service will be affected by this provision, approximately only about 20 or 30 per cent—

Approximately that; really, according to my calculation, only between 15 and 25 per cent as the utmost outside measure—of those now employed will be subject to the provision, providing for their separation from the service.

4. Of this number all those who are up to a "fair standard of efficiency" under the rules of the Civil Service Commission may be reappointed without any reexamination.

5. No opportunity for spoils is afforded, because the successor of any person separated from the service must be appointed and come into the service under the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission.

I have dwelt somewhat upon that. You would think from what was in the Washington papers and from some of the utterances upon this floor that this conference provision would carry us back to the old spoils system. Men seem to forget that these men can not get into the service after this provision any more than now by any other route than the civil-service examination route.

6. Under the law and the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission, as it now is, any head of a department can now remove an employee who is superannuated and not up to a proper standard of efficiency, but the trouble is the heads of the departments through pity will not act.

Now, it is not their pity alone. Do not blame them. You may say the head of a department ought, under his oath as a public officer, to say when John Brown is not rendering good service that he ought to be discharged, but not only does he pity the man but you pity him and I pity him, and all of us pity him, and we all go down there now and exert every bit of influence we have in individual instances to procure the retention of the inefficient, superannuated public servant. In that far we are also neglecting a strictly construed duty and not abiding by our public duty any more than is the department chief. The only excuse for it is that human nature has in it a great deal of the milk of human kindness, and that the average man never does execute a law unless he is forced to it up to the point of cruelty to the man against whom he executes it, except in cases where the guilt of the victim is involved—some absolute moral guilt.

7. Under this provision, by operation of the law and the rules of the Civil Service Commission, the separation takes place, and it is believed that it will be easier for the head of the department to free the service of those who are found by the Civil Service Commission to be wholly superannuated or inefficient.

Now, upon that the only comment to make is that that is not only true, but under the operation of this proposed provision fewer of these pitiable cases would present themselves. As I said a moment ago, if the man thought that at the end of seven years he might have to go, he would not be a child, as he is now, relying upon some governmental provender, but he would try to take care of himself by saving a little per week and per month and per annum, and at the end of the time, even if old, he would not be necessitous, as he is now.

8. Under the existing civil-service requirements imposed by the Executive all appointments are for probationary periods of 6 or 12 months, at the expiration of which it is optional with the appointing power whether the appointment shall be made permanent. It is rare that such appointments are not made, for the reason that all probationers exert their very best efforts to demonstrate fitness and qualifications for their jobs.

And they will do it, too, under the seven-year period.

Under the seven-year tenure the Government will have the probationary period and its resultant zeal multiplied just seven times more than it now is.

It is a notorious fact in Washington that the men who are appointed do their work in their probationary period better than they do it afterwards in so far as zeal is concerned. I do not mean in so far as accuracy is concerned, because practice is necessary for that to some extent, but so far as being at their posts always and being zealous and trying to demonstrate that their services are valuable to the Government, this is marked in the probationary period.

9. This is the only alternative that can be adopted if we are to avoid a civil pension list.

Now, the question is, Do you want to avoid it, and if any of you have any other way of avoiding it than something like this, why not give the country the benefit of it? If any of you can, even at this late day, give the country the benefit of it. The country would be glad to hear it from you, because the country is not going to sit tamely down and bear, in addition to the overwhelming burdens of the military and naval pensions, a burden of civil servants, pensions growing, after a while, perhaps, to be almost equally overwhelming, to be borne upon the backs and bent forms of the farmers and mechanics and teachers of the land.

You either, then, must avoid that civil-service retirement pension list, with its burdens, or you must put up with the present deadwood, which obstructs every office in the city, or you must adopt either this or something like it to prevent it, or you must suggest of your own motion something else that will prevent it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very reluctant to take the floor, even for a moment, for I dislike to contribute, even in the smallest degree, to the endless flood of debate which is now holding Congress in session. I can not, however, allow this provision in reference to the seven-year term to go through without entering my protest, and I will do so as briefly as I can.

I recognize the intent on the part of the House in this clause; I recognize the intent of the conferees; and I do not, in the least, question the good purpose which they have in view. I recognize fully that some method must be adopted to rid the service of the inefficient and, so far as possible, of the superannuated.

I have always strongly opposed civil pensions; I should with great reluctance go so far even as to support a scheme for insurance; but I am not going to enter upon that large field now. I want to call attention simply to the defect, to the danger, of this provision, however good its purpose may be.

In section 4, as agreed on by the conferees, and to which nobody seems to have paid much attention, there is a very wise provision which, I think, largely meets the difficulty. It says:

Such system shall provide a minimum rating of efficiency which must be attained by an employee before he may be promoted.

It also provides a rating. I drop out the word "maximum," which I understand is left out in the agreement. It reads:

It shall also provide a rating below which no employee may fall without being demoted.

By which I suppose they mean "reduced"—

It shall further provide for a rating below which no employee may fall without being dismissed for inefficiency.

That provides an automatic system requiring the removal of the inefficient as fast as they fall below a certain rating, giving the head of the department no choice. I recognize that the right of removal exists; I recognize, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has pointed out, the unwillingness of any man on his own motion to put in force the removal, and that he should be given a system which compels him, and, therefore, helps him to do it. The error of this clause, the trouble is, that it does not require the head of the department or bureau to reappoint the efficient; that is the mischief of it. This provision does not read "that all persons separated hereunder from the classified service shall be eligible for, and shall be reappointed without examination if they fulfill the conditions of efficiency." It says "may." It is all left to the discretion of the head of the bureau or the department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Massachusetts think, however, that if the provision had been worded in that way it would have been trenching upon the constitutional power of removal by the Executive? Perhaps that was the reason that this language was put in, the conferees believing that these executive officers would obey the spirit of the law without attempting to circumscribe the constitutional power of removal vested in the Executive.

Mr. LODGE. Yes. I am pointing out the error, the great mischief of this provision, which is that it leaves it in the discretion of the Executive, of the head of the bureau, or whoever it may be, to remove all of these men. That will have but one effect. The people who are threatened with removal at the end of the seven-year period will all be gathering together all the forces they can to bring all the pressure that is possible upon the appointing power to retain them. It occurs every day and all the time; and it is the most inefficient who bring the heaviest pressure. Under the present system the efficient clerks never come up here for assistance; it is the inefficient who come for political help. We should not, in my view, put this limitation on. It does not add in the slightest degree to the good effect that will be produced by section 4, but it seems to me that it will deteriorate the whole service, and it will make those men just struggle to keep sufficient force behind them to hold their places at the end of seven years, whereas if they should have over them a provision like section 4, it would oblige them constantly to attain a certain rating, or otherwise they would lose their places automatically. There you have the effect of the probationary period that would make them work to retain their places. If you throw them all upon a reappointment at the end of seven years, they are bound to introduce political pressure. That is not a full restoration of the spoils system, but it is a reintroduction of the worst feature of the spoils system, which is the outside political pressure to enable a man to retain his place.

Mr. President, I am not going into the details of the matter. I have taken more time now than I wished to take. I only desired to record my protest against this clause, because I believe that its adoption would be very injurious to the Government service.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say that I think the provision of the Senate amendment, section 4, as it appears in the House print of the bill, and which is now the first part of the present section in the conference report, is very admirable. I think the provision for an efficiency record, for regulating promotion and demotion, and for automatically dropping the employees according to the grade reached in the efficiency record, is a most admirable improvement of our system. I can not, however, agree with the provision of this amendment which is called section 5 in the report. I think it would be most injurious to the morale and the efficiency of the system, and I can not agree to any report which contains that provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from New York takes his seat I want to call his attention to the fact that the very provision to which he adverts and of which he so highly approves is made a part of this conference report by the language "hereinafter prescribed."

Mr. ROOT. I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So that the rule by means of which the executive department shall at the end of the seven-year period guide themselves in attempting a reappointment without examination of employees is the rule prescribed in that fourth section—I think it is, or wherever it is—which the Senator has just read, and of which he so highly approves, and which was also so highly approved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Therefore that is part and parcel of this conference agreement as much as if it were set forth in so many words in it.

Mr. ROOT. I understand that, Mr. President, and I should be sorry to lose it; but there is nothing in these provisions which imposes the observance of that efficiency record upon the head of the department who makes the reappointments or refuses to make them in his discretion. He can reappoint whom he pleases and leave out whom he pleases; and it is a complete subversion of the principle that faithful and efficient service shall be a title to continued employment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question in reference to the matter about which he has been speaking. It is stated that there are 250,000 employees under the civil service. How many are upon the waiting list upon which the spoils system could operate? Is there now or is there likely to be upon the waiting list certified for appointment one-half of 1 per cent of the whole number? If that be the case, what opportunity is there then for the spoils system to operate upon them? We at least could have only 1 perhaps out of 250, and if 15 per cent were to be discharged where would the departments secure others to take their places? It seems to me from the very nature of the case all of those, or practically all of those, who are efficient would be compelled to be reappointed in order to maintain the service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in opposition to section 5. I sympathize with much that has been said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I have no doubt that the real object of this proposed legislation is to get rid of the inefficient and to put a block in the way of the effort to establish a pension list. I believe there ought to be some more practical and certain way to get the inefficient out of the service, and I am not prepared to support a pension list for the old or the incompetent. I think we have gone too far already with pension lists on account of old age and incompetency; but I will not now enter into a discussion of that question.

My objections are twofold to this section. I think it weakens the value of section 4, for when it prescribes a seven-year period for the term of office section 4 will be used much less effectively to remove the inefficient. There will be a disposition to carry them over the entire seven-year period of their appointment, and there will be a hindrance to the prevention of the retention of the inefficient, the inefficient all having a seven-year commission. When legislation upon this line is to be passed, if a term of office is to be fixed, I think it should be much less than seven years. Four years at the most would be long enough.

I object to the provision that the efficient shall require the discretion of the head of the department or the head of the bureau to be reappointed. If the provision declared for a four-year term and required at the end of that time that only those who have made a record for excellency should be reappointed, and provided that those who have made the record should positively be reappointed, then the measure would be valuable.

Section 5 does not go into effect for seven years. There is, therefore, no necessity for hurrying it through on an appropriation bill. We have seven years in which to legislate to meet any need that section 5 proposes to meet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has just stated that his objection would cease if there was a positive requirement that in one event the employee should be reappointed and in the other event that he should be dropped. Does the Senator think that any possible action by the Congress of the United States could deprive the President of any constitutional power that he possesses? The Executive has the discretion to appoint and to remove, and it is only pursuasively and in so far as he is guided by rules and regulations to which the Executive himself by his particular conduct becomes a party that these rules are carried out, because if a President of the United States, or a Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, chooses to discharge a man, he would be discharged, civil-service rules or no civil-service rules. John G. Carlisle brought that point to an issue under Cleveland's administration. He made it too plain for argument and acted upon it, the Civil Service Commission to the contrary notwithstanding. So that when we merely say that this is in the discretion of the Executive we are adding nothing to what would exist, anyhow, no matter what we said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not agree with the Senator from Mississippi in the position he has just taken. Our civil-service rules limit the places from which these appointments are to be made; they exclude the privilege of appointing from the outside; and the law could be so framed that the men with a four-year term should automatically receive a reappointment for four years longer. I believe it is a mistake to leave open their reappointment. If they are efficient, we want them, and we ought to keep them, and it is not desirable legislation to change their continuation of service from one of certainty into one of uncertainty.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] rose to protest against this provision upon the ground that it was introducing the spoils system. I rise to protest against this hue and cry of "the spoils system" every time any effort is made to change the present law regarding appointments in the Government service. If I understand what "the spoils system" was—it was before my day in the Senate—it was a system whereby, through the influence of Members of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, persons were appointed to the Government service without any examination as to their fitness, and positions were being filled by men and women who were not competent to fill them. I understand that to be what is meant by "the spoils system"; and I can not understand how we can still insist that we are going back to the spoils system when we have here a provision for a most rigid examination of every person who desires to apply for a Government position.

I have looked over the questions that have been propounded to those who are to be examined in the civil branches. I am quite certain that the average Senator in this Chamber could not reach the 75 per cent required in answering those questions, and would be wholly unfit and incapable of filling one of those positions under the civil-service examination; but with that examination, rigid as it is, with that examination continued as one of the requirements of entry into the public service, I fail to see how any change in the matter of fixing a limitation upon the term of office or the position of these employees is reintroducing the old spoils system. That proposition is just as hazy to me as the new proposition of putting the Government back into the hands of the people, from which, by some method, it is claimed that it has been wrested, though we never knew it during the 140 years of our living under the Constitution.

Mr. President, only the three highest upon the civil-service list can be appointed to any position when there is a demand, and, as I have stated before, I do not believe there are 2,000 of those upon the list now waiting to be appointed. If I am correct, the percentage would be about as 2,000 to 250,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to an interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. If I am in error, I always desire to be corrected.

Mr. BURTON. I think the Senator has very much underrated the number. In the report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ending June 30, 1911, a statement is given of the number who were examined and passed during that year. The number who were examined was 113,628, and the number who passed and who would be eligible to appointment was 77,236; so that, if we may take that year as a criterion, there would be at least 30 per cent on the eligible list. I think the Senator from Iowa stated the number in the classified civil service as 235,000; but whether it be 235,000 or 250,000, as has been stated as an approximation, there would be an eligible list of more than 30 per cent, instead of the very small percentage the Senator from North Dakota mentions.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio undoubtedly did not catch the force of my remarks. I said that, subject to appointment on call, are only the three highest on the eligible list. They must first be taken, and those must first be exhausted. Therefore when you begin the operation of "the spoils system" you do not operate it upon the 60,000 or 70,000 that may be upon that list, but it must operate upon the three highest upon the list as it is presented at the time the application is made for another civil-service appointment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. The fact that the appointing officer has the right to name one of the three does not mean that the other two will be rejected. The whole list is eligible and if one having the appointive power should habitually reject the two highest and choose the third he ought to be called down for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, undoubtedly he would be called down on account of it. The Senator certainly understands that there has been no serious complaint about that provision of the law, and it has been upon our statute books for some considerable time. I have no doubt if it would be abused we could very easily change the law so as to take the applicant who stands highest, and give no place for the operation of the spoils system even as to that list.

But, Mr. President, there is a principle at stake, a great American principle, that has been abused ever since we have had the civil-service law, and that is, the moment we separated ourselves from the system of monarchy that moment we declared in favor of every man and woman who sought an official position dependent upon his or her ability to fill that position and the consent of the public. I am opposed, and always have been opposed, to any law that should give a life position to any employee of the Government. It is un-American; it unfits a man or woman for the ordinary battle of life; it makes them unnatural, because nature has never created a condition in which humanity has advanced to a point where each individual does not have to depend upon his own energy and his own ability to contend against the obstacles that lie in his path.

Mr. President, the great elements in our nature that are necessary for human progress in the industrial, in the political, and in any other line of human activity are hope and fear, ambition and necessity. No man, woman, or child ever advanced in this world unless there was always before him or her the goddess of hope to lure him or her on; and not only that, but the god of necessity, with a sharp spear to accelerate the forward movement.

Mr. President, whenever we eliminate those two factors we have taken that out of our nature, we have eliminated that from our surroundings which is necessary for our own proper development and for the proper development of our abilities in the particular line in which we are engaged. I am opposed to life tenure in any position. For that reason, Mr. President, I shall heartily support this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator think that we are entitled to have this subject come to us as separate legislation and not on an appropriation bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the two Houses can not agree, then I believe that all general legislation should be eliminated from appropriation bills.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to be very brief in the last word I have to say upon this subject, and I would not say anything if I did not believe that this is a dangerous attack upon the system which seems to have met the approval of most of the thinking people of the United States. I understand perfectly that there is a school of thought opposed to the civil service. I have heard it expressed here in somewhat this way, that when one enters the service and remains there a long time he becomes unfitted for the general battle of life, and that he ought to be turned out while still young and strong in order to again make his position in the general business of the world.

There is something to be said in favor of that proposition, but this is not that proposition. This, as it seems to me, is a plain invitation to the heads of departments to decline to recognize honest and faithful and efficient service at any age in life and turn back the employee by reason of personal disfavor or political influence.

I do not suggest even that those who are for the proposition have any other than the highest motives and the best intent for their country, but when it is said, as it has been said so eloquently this morning, that the present system leads inevitably to a civil pension list, and that we must sustain this change in the law because if we do not resort to a limited tenure we must adopt a civil-pension list, it seems to me that sufficient reflection did not precede that assertion. I dispute it. I am opposed to a civil pension; I have always been and am now; and if I believed that the alternatives were on the one side a civil pension and upon the other side a limited tenure, I would accept the limited tenure, for I recognize the force of the argument made by the Senator from Mississippi. There is no reason why the people of this country in private pursuits should be compelled to bear the burden that would be created through and by a civil-pension list. It is not, however, necessary to accept either of the alternatives.

The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment has now before the Senate a solution of that problem. Possibly Senators have not read it. It employs, however, a very familiar principle. It is simply a compulsory saving system. It requires every employee who enters the civil service to contribute monthly from his compensation a sum that will be sufficient at his retiring age to do what a civil pension in some countries is designed to do. There is no difficulty whatsoever in the application of that solution to this problem. If we can not solve it in that way, there still remains the alternative of compelling separation from the service at the retiring age by law without any compensation whatsoever, leaving the employee, knowing that this time and this condition are approaching, to make such provision for his old age as may seem possible to him.

Therefore we ought not, as it seems to me, to judge of the wisdom of this measure through the fear of a civil pension list, for, as I have just suggested, that is not the necessary outcome to the present system.

It is not true that employees of the Government are appointed for life. No one suggests a tenure of that sort. They are not even appointed during good behavior, as are our judges. They are appointed during efficiency; and if the law and the regulations are not sufficient to secure the efficiency, then let us change the law and prescribe other regulations which are intended to secure efficiency.

Employees of the Government are appointed precisely as are the employees of a railway company or of a bank or of any other great industrial institution. I know that the analogy is not perfect, but in both cases they are appointed, and they ought to be appointed, during such time as they are able to render the service which their employer requires of them. When they are unable to render that service, then they ought to be dismissed and returned to a field of employment in which they could render service.

What would be thought of a financial or an industrial institution taking on its employees under a term of one year or five years or seven years, with the statement that if during these years you are faithful and efficient you may or may not be reappointed, but if you are inefficient or unfaithful then you are to be dismissed?

I do not liken these employments to offices. There is no sense in which these employees are officeholders. They are simply performing the business of the Government, and I think we ought to take them on and dismiss them according to the law which governs business in its relation to its employees.

In my opinion—it is only opinion, and can only be—if we pass this law we will not be able to secure as high capacity in our civil list as we now have. There is little enough reward now. There is little enough hope now. As the Senator from Ohio said, the public service ought to be a career; but it is not a promising career. The rewards for high capacity, high efficiency, great ability are not sufficient to tempt men and women so endowed into the service. And when we put this additional discouragement upon them in my judgment we will have done much to deteriorate the service of the country.

I can not believe that there is anything good to be accomplished in notifying all the civil-service employees that at the end of seven years they will then be at the discretion of their heads of departments, without respect to the quality of the work that they have performed during those seven years.

A day or two ago the attitude of the Civil Service Commission toward this question was mentioned by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I have high regard for the members of the Civil Service Commission and I accept their opinions as I accept the opinions of other men of wide observation and, in this instance, of great experience. I want, however, to make it perfectly clear to the Senate, and I think I have the authority to do so, just what the members of the Civil Service Commission believe with respect to the proposition contained in the report of the conferees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yesterday the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] both gave notice that they would make remarks upon the bill as soon as it came before the Senate, and therefore I shall not ask that the bill be laid aside. I desire to state that I shall endeavor to keep it before the Senate continuously until it is finally acted upon.

Mr. THORNTON. I did not catch the conclusion of the remark of the chairman of the committee, but personally I am willing to wait until the Senator from Iowa can conclude.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply stated that I would endeavor to keep this bill before the Senate until it is finally acted upon, and if no Senator desires to speak at present, of course the question I assume is on the pending amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was just remarking respecting the attitude of the Civil Service Commission upon the question. While it may be true, I have no reason to doubt that it is true, that the distinguished and venerable chairman of the Civil Service Commission is in favor of the plan stated in the conferees' report—I do not know that, I only infer it from the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming—I have been authorized to say on behalf of the two remaining members of the board that they look upon this departure with serious alarm. I beg to read a copy of the letter which was transmitted by one of the members of the commission to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Is that a copy of the letter which was sent to the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will give me credit for having already read it, so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear it read. I know the Senator from Wyoming referred to it. But I read it simply to show the position of one of the members of the commission, and then I will read another which I have upon my desk in order to show the opinion of the other.

This is a letter written May 28, 1912, to the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1912.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the pleasure, complying with the request made by you when I appeared before your committee yesterday, of submitting observations respecting section 5, H. R. 24023, to establish a five-year term of office act and offering a substitute for it. I desire also to invite your attention to a copy of a report made by me to the Civil Service Commission on February 1, 1910, constituting a detailed explanation of an efficiency system under the substitute proposed for section 5 of the bill.

In submitting these remarks, I beg to express my belief that it is necessary that a method be provided for the elimination of the incapable and unfit from the service, but the experience of this commission makes it certain that the measure as embodied in the House bill, so far from promoting the purpose sought to be attained, will have disastrous results; and the commission is convinced that the purpose may be effectively attained by the establishment of a system of efficiency regulations to be promulgated by the President.

The adoption of such a system will avoid the pressure upon Members of Congress which would be inevitable if the term of office shall be adopted, and at the same time relieve executive officers from excessive demands upon their attention and an intolerable burden in giving them so wide a latitude of discretion in making reappointments at the expiration of the term of office.

The substitute provision is calculated to provide an efficiency system which shall be continuous and whereby unfit persons will be automatically separated from the service without waiting for expiration of term of office. It is believed that this is a more scientific method of accomplishing the results desired by Congress, and at the same time unattended by the manifest evils of a tenure of office provision.

Very sincerely, yours,

JOHN A. MCILHENNY.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. That letter was as it purported to be in reply to a request on the part of the subcommittee after they had had a conference with I think the chairman or president of the unofficial Civil Service Association.

After a conference with those who represent the unofficial Civil Service Association, we asked for a substitute to section 5. Later, it was sent to us by one of the Civil Service Commissioners, and we adopted it. It has been changed as to two words, and we added what is in section 5 as to soldiers and sailors.

We came to the Senate with that, and, as the Senator remembers, there was a good deal of debate. It was passed in that way and we went to conference with it. Thereupon in conference we met those from the other side who had a letter considered to be of equal importance from the Chairman of the Board of Civil Service Commissioners proposing, as the other member had done, something in place of section 5, showing that there was a division of opinion, as oftentimes and generally there is a division here. In the conference, both of these propositions were before the conferees, and the final determination was that which is now before us.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understood all that. I was trying to vindicate the judgment of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate in accepting the views of Mr. McIlhenny, and I am trying to say that the Senate, with deliberation and after a good deal of argument, adopted the views of the Senate committee, which were the views of Mr. McIlhenny, speaking for the commission at that time. I am endeavoring, with all the earnestness I possess, to persuade the Senate to stand by its Appropriations Committee in its original action and stand by its original decision with regard to this important matter.

Mr. WARREN. Right there, I wish to make only an observation. I hope the Senator will credit the conferees on the part of the Senate with standing by through many a long day and many a long meeting. It is not a matter where the conferees went into conference and yielded at once to the demand of the House, but it was among the last things that was agreed upon. First, there seemed a necessity that we should have an agreement on the whole bill; and, second, I am free to say that the more I look at the matter the more I am convinced that the proposition made by the Senate—long before the seven years have elapsed—will have so cured the want of other or further reform in the civil service that the seven-year clause will not be the last word, and legislation favorable to civil service will follow.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Wyoming will understand that just now I am trying to show the attitude of the commission toward this question, and I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee. I want to see his report overthrown, of course. I think we ought to stand more firmly for the system as it is now organized.

But I now refer to the letter which I received yesterday from the one other member of the Civil Service Commission. It reads as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1912.

Hon. A. B. CUMMINS,
Chairman Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CUMMINS: Referring to the debate in the Senate on last Saturday relating to the limited-tenure proposition for civil-service employees reported by the conferees on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and in order that there may be no misapprehension of the views of a majority of the commission, I am inclosing herewith a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate under date of May 28, 1912. The substitute for the limited-tenure provision as passed by the House was agreed upon by Commissioner McIlhenny and myself and transmitted by Commissioner McIlhenny in response to a verbal request of the Senate committee. This substitute was incorporated in the Senate bill as section 4 of that bill.

Very sincerely, yours, WM. S. WASHBURN.

I believe, Mr. President, that the general judgment of the country will sustain the judgment of these two members of the Civil Service Commission. I believe it will sustain the original action of the Committee on Appropriations. I fear that if we overturn this system now we will deeply regret it in the days to come. It is a marvelous, it is an astonishing proposition to say that there can be no original appointments except from a list indicating efficiency created by the Civil Service Commission, but that there can be dismissals from the service after long and faithful and efficient work. What a spectacle it is to say that no one can enter the service until he has proved his efficiency in the way required by the law and regulations, and yet to add to that the announcement that at the end of seven years, having demonstrated his fitness for the work, he must then surrender, with the experience of the seven years, and be retired to the general life of the world at the discretion of the head of a department.

I earnestly hope that the report will not be approved, and that our conferees will be instructed to stand still further for this wise, sound principle in our public service.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, as a member of the Interoceanic Canals Committee, I have attended all of its 21 sittings on this subject save 5, and on those occasions I was with other committees, principally that on Naval Affairs, and I doubt if this attendance record was excelled by any other member of the committee except the chairman, and I have closely followed the discussion in this Chamber from the beginning.

I wish to briefly state my conclusions on two important matters pertaining to the Panama Canal bill, which are productive of great diversity of opinion in the Senate, viz: First, the right of the United States to permit the free use of the canal to any ships sailing under the American flag, while collecting tolls from the ships of all other nations; and, second, whether admitting the right to thus exempt ships sailing under her own flag, it would comport with public policy to extend this privilege to all such ships.

Able arguments in favor of and against the right of control of the United States in this matter have been made on the floor of this Chamber during the discussion, and to me it seems wonderful that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the construction of which has produced such discordant views, a document treating of matters of such great interest to the world in general and to the United States in particular, should have been so drawn that different Senators seem compelled to look at it from such different angles and draw diametrically opposite conclusions from a study of it.

It is the first part of paragraph 1 of article 3 which is the bone of contention, if I may be pardoned for using such a reference to it, and which reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

It is contended by some that this language includes the United States in the term "all nations," and hence precludes her from extending favors to her own citizens or commerce not extended to the citizens or commerce of other countries, while others maintain that the term "all nations" necessarily means all other nations, and does not preclude us from favoring our own people, but only binds us to deal impartially with all other people.

As for myself, I had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the United States had under the terms of the treaty the undoubted right to exempt from the payment of tolls all American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

It is a well-known legal rule that in the interpretation of a statute its context must be studied and the spirit and object of the law sought for.

We see in the first part of the disputed paragraph that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality; but we also see in the second part of the same paragraph that the end sought to be accomplished by this first part, the spirit and object of the law, as it were, is that there shall be no discrimination against any nation.

Now, it is well known that at the time of this treaty the ships of no other nation were permitted to do business in the coastwise trade of the United States, and that is the law still, and certainly it can not be abrogated by this treaty.

It follows then, that as no foreign ship can operate in our coastwise trade and compete with us in that trade we are not discriminating against such ships by allowing to our own coastwise ships the free use of the canal.

These were the views I expressed in the committee sessions, as will appear by the printed report of the proceedings, and I voted in accordance with them.

But when it came to the proposition of giving free passage to American ships engaged in the foreign trade a different condition prevailed, for foreign ships using the canal might compete with our own ships in the foreign trade, and free tolls to our own ships might be a discrimination against the ships of other nations.

This view I also expressed during the committee sessions, as will appear by the report, and for that reason I declined to vote on the question, stating to the committee that I wished further time to consider it, a statement in which I was joined, as I now remember, by one other member of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

And as I was in doubt then, candor to the Senate and to myself as well compels me to say that I am in some doubt still on this particular question, though I am reluctant to admit that I have been unable to come to a positive opinion on the pure question of law presented.

However, I have concluded that I would be justified in resolving my doubt in favor of the interest of the people of the United States, and shall accordingly vote to allow the free passage through the canal of all American ships.

The next question of difference is whether American ships engaged in transoceanic trade, owned or controlled by railroads, shall be permitted to use the canal if they also engage in coastwise trade.

There are some who fear that if such permission is given it will result in a monopoly of the trade by the railroad owned or controlled ships and that independent steamship lines will be driven out of the coastwise trade through the stifling of competition.

There is at this time only one American steamship line doing either a trans-Atlantic or trans-Pacific business.

This line is the Pacific Mail Co., which has four fine ships operating between San Francisco and the Orient, competing with the heavily subsidized Japanese lines.

This company has been in existence for many years, but it was owned by private persons until 1900, when 51 per cent of its stock was acquired by the Southern Pacific Railroad, which still owns that amount of stock, the remaining 49 per cent being distributed between some 1,100 stockholders.

This Pacific Mail Co. is the only railroad owned or controlled steamship line that appeared before the committee asking to be allowed the use of the canal, and in the nature of things it would seem to be the only American railroad owned or controlled steamship line that would wish to use it.

The great bulk of the business of this company is a passenger business between San Francisco and the Orient, where it is operating four splendid steamers.

What it now wishes to do is to build four more splendid, fast steamers, making eight in all, and have one to leave New York for the Orient once every two weeks, making no stop until reaching Colon, the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal, where it will take on freight for the Orient that has been brought to Colon by smaller steamers from the Gulf ports, then proceed through the canal, touching at Los Angeles, San Francisco, and over the sea to Honolulu, on to Yokohama, Japan, Manila, and Hongkong, and thence back to New York by same route, a voyage of 25,000 miles.

Four new ships, costing $12,000,000, are to be immediately contracted for in American shipyards, if the company is permitted to use the canal.

The company will have to depend on its passenger traffic to make the enterprise pay, but wishes to supplement this by getting such freight for the Orient as it can pick up at Colon, Los Angeles, and San Francisco.

Yet there is opposition to this plan based on the fear that it will stifle competition, although the outside cargoes of freight carried by these boats could not exceed 200,000 tons per year, while it is estimated that several millions of tons per year will pass through the canal.

I do not see how competition on the great highway of the ocean can be stifled in this way.

I wish to help American shipyards, employing thousands of American workmen, by all legitimate means that I can; and I wish to see the American flag flying from all the ships possible; and these ships must be built in American shipyards and must sail under the American flag.

I would not for a moment be willing for them to use the canal if they could thereby destroy competition, but I have no fear that they can do it or that they will attempt to do it, knowing as they do that the same governmental agency that permits them to use the canal will be invoked to forbid its use for them if they try to abuse the privilege.

Congress is in session practically all the time and could, whenever deemed necessary, forbid the use of the canal to any railroad owned or controlled ship that sought to act in a manner detrimental to the public interest.

It is useless to say that if these ships are once allowed to use the canal it will not be possible to ever revoke the permission, for we all know that in this country the antirailroad side is the popular side.

These ships could be put under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, if necessary, from the outset, and that would certainly remove the possible danger of attempting to strangle competition.

I know the Interstate Commerce Commission does not desire to be vested with this jurisdiction, but that is no reason it should not be if deemed necessary, and it is idle to say that it is not practicable to do it, for it is a matter of administration that could be certainly worked out.

But I do not think it is necessary to do so, for the knowledge of the company that it would be denied the use of the canal by Congress if it acted against the public interest would be sufficient in itself to make it careful.

Personally I believe that there would be more danger to competition without the operation of these railroad ships than with their operation, for independent steamship lines can easily enter into a combination between themselves that will prevent competition; and it is in evidence before the committee that no competition exists between the foreign lines between New York and Europe nor in the coastwise trade on the Atlantic coast, and yet these are not railroad-owned ships.

I do not believe in prohibiting these railroad-owned ships from using the canal, but I believe in regulating them if their use of it should appear to be against the public interest.

And in this view I am in pretty good company, for the committee hearings show it is shared by the President of the United States, who has changed his previous views on the subject, and by the Secretary of War, and by Prof. Johnson, the Government Special Commissioner of Panama Canal and tolls, and by Col. Goethals, and by the officials of the Panama Railroad, and by the directors of the port of Boston, and by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and by the Arkwright Club of Cotton Manufacturers, and by others.

I expressed my sentiments in this matter speaking to a witness before the committee when I said I wished all the ships possible to go through that canal and the more American-built ships and ships flying the American flag the better I would be pleased, provided always that it did not conflict with the general public interest.

That is my feeling about it, and I wish to see American shipyards and American ships given a chance in this matter.

The majority of the committee voted to give to railroad owned or controlled ships the right to use the canal on the terms desired, but on the condition that one-half of their cargoes going or returning should be freight consigned to or from the Orient.

I object to this proviso, considering that it is impossible of practical execution, because subject to contingencies beyond the power of the ship to control; and I should like to see that provision struck out of the bill.

I believe that all American ships should be allowed the use of the canal on equal terms and that these Pacific Mail Co. railroad ships should either be allowed to use the canal without conditions or not allowed to use it at all.

But I should wish to see them allowed to use it in the beginning, at least, and then let their continued use of it be contingent on the fact whether results proved such use was beneficial or detrimental to the public service.

I fully agree with the Secretary of War when, in discussing this question before the committee, he said:

> My general principle has been that I would not kill a child for fear that it was going to have the mumps. I would not kill any merchant marine that we have.

And I likewise fully agree with the statement made during the committee hearings to a witness opposed to railroad ships by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]:

> I am looking at the thing to find the solution of the problem that is best for the people. I do not give a rap for your boats or for any other boats. I do not think we are here to legislate for your benefit or for the benefit of the railroads, but we are here to legislate for the benefit of the people if we can get at it.

Later on during the hearings I said to the same witness that Senator TOWNSEND expressed the sentiment of the whole committee when, speaking for himself, he said that he did not care either more or less for a ship line because it was owned by a railroad or by an independent line, but the question was how best to conserve the general public interest, and, speaking for myself, I thought that on general principles the more ships use the canal the better the public interest is apt to be conserved.

Those were my views then and they are unchanged.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the United States owns a strip of territory across the Isthmus of Panama 10 miles wide. It is ours by grant from the Republic of Panama; no one disputes our title and no one can dispute it. Over it flies the flag of the Republic representing the sovereignty and proprietorship of the Nation just as it represents that sovereignty and proprietorship over any other territory belonging to the United States. We have established a government. Order is maintained; our courts administer justice; civil rights are enforced, and all the rights and powers of sovereignty are being exercised.

Through and across this strip of territory, and wholly within its limits, we are building with our people's money, and will soon have completed, a great canal through which will pass much of the world's commerce. This canal will be built by us and by our money. It will be operated by us. We will protect it. It is ours. It will be built through our territory; our Nation owns it. Can we say how we shall use it? That is the question which meets us at the threshold of the consideration of this bill. I have no doubt as to what the American people think about it. There is no doubt as to their answer to the question; in fact, they are very likely to be surprised that such a question should arise. It has never entered their mind that this Government could not use its own property and deal with its own people as it sees fit without asking the consent of any other government or people.

Some contend, however, that although we bought the territory, built the canal, and own them both, we must use the canal for the benefit of others and to the disadvantage of ourselves and our own people. Is this so? Can we exercise only those rights of a sovereign and of a proprietor that benefit other nations at the expense of our own people and deny them the privileges and benefits which every sovereign and proprietor ordinarily can extend to his own? If I believed that we were limited in our treatment of our own people and our own vessels, as some have contended, I would not discuss the question in open session, but if I felt compelled to advocate such a position, I would do it only in executive session, where no record would be made that could be used against our Government and people in any controversy that may hereafter arise. I do not say this in criticism of those who have publicly discussed and advocated this side of the controversy, but simply as expressing my own views as to the proper action to take. In any controversy that may arise between our Government and a foreign power, where there is room for doubt I will never admit that my Government is in the wrong except within the secret walls of this historic Chamber.

In my judgment, however, we can use this territory and this canal just as we can use any other territory or any other waterway of the country. We can permit our ships and our people to use it and occupy it just as we permit them to use any of our other waterways or territory. This is denied, however, because of a treaty between this Government and Great Britain, under which it is claimed that we can not permit our own people to use this canal except upon exactly the same terms that we allow the people of Great Britain and other nations to use it. The American people are jealous of their rights, but they also hold sacred their promise.

However unfair and however burdensome any treaty solemnly made and ratified may be, it will be sacredly kept until abrogated, and I yield to no one in upholding at any cost the Nation's honor.

Is there any treaty that restricts our power to permit the use of this canal by our own people upon such terms as we see fit to impose? Could any treaty be made that limits and restricts the power and right of the Government to deal with its own people and its own property? In my judgment the treaty-making power can not take away or cede away this right. The Senate and the President can not deprive the United States of any of its rights of sovereignty, and that is what this would be doing. If it be said that this is not ceding away sovereign rights, but it is giving or granting proprietary rights, I say this can not be done by the President and the Senate in the exercise of the treaty-making power. The right to use our canal and the territory through which it runs as we may desire is a property right, and the establishment of rules respecting the use of this canal is the establishment of rules in respect to the property or territory of the United States, and under section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution only "the Congress," and not the Senate and the President, "shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Any treaty purporting to make rules and regulations respecting that canal or the territory through which it passes and purporting to restrict its use by the United States is beyond the power of the President and the Senate and not binding upon the Government or the people of the United States. It will not be presumed that an attempt was made to do what there was no constitutional power to do.

Does the Hay-Pauncefote treaty assume to deprive us of our right to deal with and treat our own ships in the use of our own canal as we deem best? I do not think so. Surely, no one will contend that the President and Mr. Hay, who negotiated that treaty, and the Senate, which ratified it, intended to give up our right to allow our own ships to use our own canal and our own territory as we might deem best. They were patriotic men, devoted to the welfare of our country and jealous of its rights and the rights of its citizens, and I will not believe that they intended anything of the sort. If the people of this country believed that they intended to give up such rights, no words could express their indignation, and such a deliberate intention would be regarded as little short of faithlessness to the great trust reposed in them. If they had thought so when this treaty was pending, such a wave of indignation would have swept the country as would have buried such treaty in oblivion. I am sure, and the people believe, that they simply agreed that the United States would treat all nations with absolute impartiality, and insure equal treatment among them without depriving itself of any of its sovereign or proprietary rights and without recognizing the right of any people to interfere or question its treatment of its own people in regard to its own property and territory.

Ever since Balboa stood on the crest of the Cordilleras at the Isthmus of Panama and gazed upon the placid waters of the Pacific the people of the world have dreamed of a canal across the Isthmus connecting the two oceans. From the independence of the Spanish-American Republics the American people have interested themselves in this great undertaking. In 1835 the Senate instructed the President to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, with the view of affording protection to individuals or companies proposing to construct such a canal and to insure the free use and navigation of it to all nations. The Nicaragua route came into favor, and franchises were secured by various parties looking to the construction of such canal through Nicaraguan territory. Prior to 1850 Great Britain asserted a claim to a protectorate over the Mosquito coast country. Gold was discovered in California, and renewed interest in the canal was taken by the United States. In 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made and ratified.
